Mr. MORTON. I think I comprehend the question of the Senator from Georgia, and that it is this: When the duties of President of the United States are devolved upon the President pro tempore of the Senate by the death of the President of the United States, can the Senate then change the President pro tempore at pleasure, and thus in effect change the Executive of the nation? That is the question. Upon that point I am not prepared to answer. I do not know what would be the effect of the law of 1792; whether that law would have the effect to fix the tenure of the President pro tempore or not; but that it can have no effect upon his office before the contingency happens is perfectly clear. Until that time comes the question suggested cannot be raised. The idea that, because, in a certain contingency, the President pro tempore may have the duties of President of the United States devolved upon him, therefore the tenure of his office is changed in advance of that contingency, it seems to me cannot be sustained by argument. If the act of 1792 is to have this effect upon the tenure of the President pro tempore before the contingency happens, it has the same effect upon the tenure of the Speaker of the House, because in a certain contingency the Speaker of the House may become the acting Executive. Therefore, according to this argument, the Speaker of the House, as soon as he is elected, must hold for the Congress, and he cannot be removed. Has that ever been the understanding? If that construction is correct, not only has the President pro tempore of the Senate now a fixed term until after the next Presidential election and a new Vice-President shall be elected, but the Speaker of the House has a fixed term for two years, and cannot be changed. That certainly has never been the understanding. Nothing of that kind was ever contemplated. But when the contingency happens, when the duties of the President in office are devolved either upon the President pro tempore of the Senate or upon the Speaker of the House, whether he is after that contingency under the operation of the act of 1792 still removable by the Senate or the House is a different question. Certainly there can be no sound pretense that the act of 1792 would have an effect upon the tenure either of the President pro tempore of the Senate or of the Speaker of the House in advance of the contingency happening.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. Supposing the President of the United States dies and the President pro tempore of the Senate enters upon the functions and is acting as President, could not the Senate appoint a new President pro tempore?

Mr. MORTON. That is precisely one of the difficulties surrounding this question. That contingency has never yet happened. It was seriously discussed among Senators when the impeachment of President Johnson was pending, whether, in case the President pro tempore of the Senate should have the duties of the President of the United States devolved upon him, he would have to leave this Chamber and we elect another. That was a question which was then considered; and it is not free from doubt. My own impression is that he is still the President of the Senate, and that he has the duties of President of the United States devolved upon him in addition thereto; and I am informed, in regard to the president of the senate in one of the States upon whom the office of governor devolved, the governor having been impeached and removed from office, that the construction there was given to a similar provision that the president of the senate was still presiding officer of the body, and came into the senate every day and called the body to order, and then called a member to the chair. I believe that was the case in Arkansas.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. There was a case of the same kind in Illinois.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from New York says that a similar case occurred in Illinois. I think myself the law was erroneous in the beginning. Such a provision ought not to have been made.

Mr. STEVENSON. What law?

Mr. MORTON. The law devolving the duties of President of the United States on the President pro tempore of the Senate. It was an error in the beginning.

Mr. NORWOOD. The act of 1792 is one which provides for the succession to the Presidency of the United States. It provides that the President pro tempore of the Senate may become President of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORWOOD. That is an act of Congress.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORWOOD. We are now construing a clause in the Constitution which gives us power over the President pro tempore to make and unmake him, as I understand the Senator from Indiana to contend. Now, if his position be correct, would it not follow that the act of Congress would divest the Senate of a constitutional power? The act provides for this officer becoming President of the United States, and in that event we should lose control of him. In that event the act of Congress would supersede a power vested in the Senate by a provision of the Constitution, which would be a legal impossibility.

Mr. MORTON. I said that that was a question about which there was doubt; but my impression off-hand is that he would still be President pro tempore of the Senate, even after the duties of President of the United States had been devolved on him under the act of 1792. But I say this in answer to my friend from Georgia, that the effect of the Constitution, what this provision means, certainly cannot be changed by the subsequent passage of a law. The act of 1792 can have no effect upon the construction of this provision of the Constitution.

Mr. NORWOOD. Now, then, if I understand the Senator from Indiana, his position is that notwithstanding the President might die to-day and the President pro tempore of the Senate become President of the United States to-morrow by operation of the act of 1792, we still could exercise our constitutional power over that officer as the President of this body and change him.

Mr. MORTON. That is my impression; but that case has not occurred. I simply mean to say that whatever may be the effect of the act of 1792 in fixing the term of the President pro tempore, it can have no such effect until the contingency takes place, even if the Senator is right about it. It cannot have that effect in advance of the happening of the contingency.

Mr. NORWOOD. Would it not follow then, I will ask the Senator, by the exercise of the power for which he contends, that the Senate of the United States would have the constitutional power to elect a President of the United States?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; not the President of the United States.

Mr. NORWOOD. If the President pro tempore of the Senate becomes President of the United States eo instanti on the death of the President, and we the next day can change that officer, an officer of this body, and put another in the chair, would we not virtually elect the President of the United States?

Mr. MORTON. We would not elect a President of the United States at all, I submit to my friend. The President pro tempore of the Senate does not become Vice-President; he simply is the presiding officer of the Senate. He does not lose any of his functions as Senator; he votes on every question; his name is called on the roll; and he has a right to call any other member to the chair and come down and take part in the debates. He is in no sense the Vice-President of the United States; and when the duties of President of the United States are devolved upon the President of the Senate pro tempore, he does not become President of the United States, but he is simply performing the duties of that officer for the time being under the law.

A little further, Mr. President. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] read some remarks by Mr. Seward in the Senate of the United States to which I want to call the attention of the Senate, inasmuch as I put a directly different construction upon the effect of that speech from that contended for by the Senator from Pennsylvania. This was in 1854:

> The Secretary called the Senate to order. * * *
> Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I offer the following resolution:
> "Resolved, That the Senate do proceed forthwith to the choice of a President pro tempore."
> Mr. SEWARD. Before we proceed with this election. I should like to have the views of Senators in regard to the effect of the appointment—whether it is to be an absolute appointment of a President pro tempore, and what the tenure of his office is to be. I will state very freely my own opinion in going into this election, and it is this: that there can be but one person at the same time holding the office of President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, and that that person will hold his office until it shall again constitutionally become vacant; so that in the case of a vacancy occurring in the office of the President of the United States the person now to be chosen to fill the office of President pro tempore of the Senate would succeed to that high trust and become the Chief Executive Magistrate of the United States.

I agree with that entirely. There can be but one President pro tempore at a time. Now suppose the President pro tempore has a fixed term until the Vice-President comes here; to-morrow morning he is sick; he cannot get here. Cannot the Senate hold a session? Can we not call another Senator to the chair? What is he? Is he not President pro tempore? My friend from North Carolina says no; he is only an occasional officer.

Mr. MERRIMON. I say this: he is not the President pro tempore recognized and provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. MORTON. I think I know what my friend said; I have it written down here. He said that we could elect in the absence of the first President pro tempore another, but that the second President pro tempore is an occasional officer. I think he is rather occasional; but that he is President pro tempore within the meaning of the Constitution is very clear. That thing occurred precisely in the history of the Senate, and I want to refer the Senate to the case.

On the 9th day of June, 1856, Jesse D. Bright was President of the Senate pro tempore, (the Vice-President, William R. King, being dead,) and addressed the following note to Hon. Charles E. Stuart, a Senator from Michigan:

> SIR: Do me the favor to take the chair to-day.
> Yours truly, J. D. BRIGHT.

Mr. Stuart appeared in the Senate, took the chair, and called the Senate to order. The power of Mr. Bright, as President pro tempore, to depute Mr. Stuart to take the chair and preside over the Senate was denied by several Senators, whereupon Mr. Stuart was by resolution elected President pro tempore of the Senate. Afterward, on the 11th of June, Mr. Stuart resigned his office as President pro tempore, and, on motion, Jesse D. Bright was re-elected President pro tempore. The idea that Mr. Bright continued to hold his office as President pro tempore by virtue of his first election was not suggested by anybody.

Mr. Bright was President pro tempore, the Vice-President being dead. He went away, and Mr. Stuart was elected President pro tempore. When Mr. Bright came back, Mr. Stuart, as a matter of courtesy, resigned his position, and then the Senate re-elected Mr. Bright. The idea that Mr. Bright had a fixed term and could take the chair by virtue of his first election did not occur to anybody.

Mr. MERRIMON. There was no debate about it.

Mr. MORTON. There was no debate about it. The Senator's point did not suggest itself to anybody at that time. I have sometime said that while there were new inventions, there were no new discoveries in constitutional law; but I presume I was mistaken in that.

One argument made, I think by my friend from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] and perhaps by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] also, was that the President pro tempore of the Senate ought to be independent of the body; that if he is removable or holds at the pleasure of the body he is not independent. Why should he be independent? He ought not to be independent. He is the mere agent of the body; he is there for the purpose of presiding over the body, and he ought to be subject to the will of the body just like the presiding officer of every other deliberative body; and that is the precise reason given in the general law why the presiding officer can be changed at any time, that the majority of the members have a right to have a presiding officer that suits them.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I suggest to my friend that the Constitution provides expressly that the regular presiding officer of the Senate shall be beyond the control of the Senate, to wit, the Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly, in that case the Vice-President is beyond our control. He is made President of the Senate by the Constitution. We have no control over him; but when we call in a temporary presiding officer he does not become Vice-President; he has no casting vote; he is simply a presiding officer, just like the presiding officer of the House of Representatives, or of any house of a legislative body in one of the States; and there is the same reason for giving the Senate the control of him that there is for giving the House of Representatives the control of their Speaker. Does anybody doubt that the House can to-morrow change the Speaker and put a new one in the chair?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do.

Mr. MORTON. My friend says he does, but it is the first time I ever heard that doubt expressed by anybody. It is laid down expressly by Mr. Jefferson, and I may say by all works upon parliamentary law, that the Speaker can be changed by the House at its pleasure. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who has long been a distinguished member of the House, tells me that that has always been the understanding in the House. Although they have had no occasion to exercise the power, it has always been the understanding that the Speaker could be changed at the pleasure of the House.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. Jefferson stated the general law. He did not undertake to discuss how far the Constitution controlled that particular officer. I think it very questionable whether the House has the power under the Constitution to remove at pleasure the Speaker.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that my friend thinks so.

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers," says the Constitution. It has the same power to choose the Speaker as to choose the other officers, and to choose the other officers as to choose the Speaker. If the House has not power to change the Speaker, it has not power to change the Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms; and, once elected, they must hold throughout the Congress, however distasteful that may be to the House. Will the Senator contend for that? And yet the power of the House to choose the Speaker is just the same as it is to choose their other officers; and if the Speaker cannot be removed at pleasure, their other officers cannot be; and so it is here in regard to the Senate. "The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore." It is put upon the same footing precisely; and if the Senate has not the power to change the President pro tempore, it has not the power to change the Sergeant-at-Arms. The Senate has the same power to elect these officers in either case, and the tenure is left precisely the same.

I believe, Mr. President, I have no occasion to say more.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I desire to say that the usage of the Senate upon the question of the tenure of the President pro tempore for seventy years has been directly opposed to the argument of the Senator from Indiana. I confess frankly that precedents in legislation are not necessarily conclusive evidence of what the law is. But when there has been, as in this case, a long unbroken series of precedents, always in one direction, it is strongly persuasive that their construction of this clause of the Constitution is the true one. This argument finds additional support when we ascertain such jurists as Judge Collamer, of Vermont, and James A. Bayard, of Delaware, able and honored members of the legal profession, opposed in political sentiment, concurring in opinion that the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is one of fixed tenure, and is not subject to removal at the mere pleasure of the Senate. The debates in 1861 show that Senators Collamer and Bayard differed—not upon the point of the permancy of the tenure of the President pro tempore, not upon the point that that officer did not hold his appointment at the mere pleasure of the Senate, as the pending resolution asserts. No, sir; they differed alone upon the point upon the duration of the appointment. Mr. Collamer held that the President pro tempore continued to hold his position during the absence of the Vice-President, during the senatorial term of such officer, and that the return of the Vice-President to the Senate did not terminate the tenure of the appointment of President pro tempore; while Mr. Bayard, upon the other hand, argued that the true limitation of the tenure of the President pro tempore during his term as Senator was the return of the Vice-President. In other words, as soon as the Vice-President took his place in the Senate the office of President pro tempore ceased and another election became necessary.

Both these eminent legal minds concurred in opinion that it was not competent for the Senate to remove the President pro tempore at their whim and pleasure. The views of each were in direct opposition to the report of the committee and to the conclusions reached by them.

There was no difference of opinion between them on the point that the office of President pro tempore was fixed by the Constitution, although they reached different results as to its duration.

I concur in the opinion of Mr. Bayard, so ably vindicated by the masterly argument of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] in the Senate on yesterday. I could, I am sure, add nothing to what was so forcibly and well said by him in support of his views of this question, and in which I so heartily concur, and I should say nothing but for the construction so earnestly insisted upon by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] in his argument to-day, and which, if it prevail, may lead to pernicious results, foreseen by the framers of the Constitution and intended to be avoided and guarded against by this clause of the Constitution creating the office of President pro tempore of the Senate.

The honorable Senator from Indiana insists that the act of 1792, declaring that the President pro tempore shall upon the happening of certain contingencies become President of the United States, cannot change the Constitution. I admit it. But that Senator will not deny that an act of Congress passed so shortly after the adoption of the Constitution as this act of 1792 constitutes a strong contemporaneous implication as to what the framers of the Constitution intended in creating the office of President pro tempore of the Senate, and as to what that Congress thought as early as 1792 was the true construction of that clause of the Constitution creating that office.

Examine the clause itself:

> The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Constitution creates this office. The incumbent is not elected by the Senate. He holds his office independently of the body over which he presides. This is an exception to usages of parliamentary law, which allows deliberative bodies to choose their presiding officers. There is no disagreement or doubt on this point. The Constitution then proceeds:

> The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] says that nobody questions the right of the Senate to choose its officers. That is a canon in parliamentary law disputed by nobody. Let that be admitted. Let it further be conceded that the framers of the Constitution were well and thoroughly versed in parliamentary law, and being so versed, none knew better than they that the Senate possessed the right under that law to choose a presiding officer in the absence of the Vice-President. With this knowledge of parliamentary usage the pertinent question arises, Why did they insert this latter clause and create the President pro tempore of the Senate a constitutional officer? It was wholly unnecessary, as argued by the Senator from Vermont. The Senate possessed the right to elect a President pro tempore. Why should the Constitution create this office? Why did the wise men who framed that instrument create an office and define its duties? They surely had an object in its creation. What was it? In the legal construction of any instrument no canon of the law is more strongly established or better recognized than that you shall so construe it as to make all its provisions harmonize, if possible, and that effect shall be given to every expression contained therein.

The first question which arises in the clause of the Constitution is, What was the intention of the framers of this Constitution in creating the President pro tempore of the Senate a constitutional officer? The Senate would have had the right to choose him without it. It will not do to say that this is an unnecessary provision; it would be disrespectful to the memory of those wise men to say that this clause is mere surplusage. You must therefore so construe this clause as to give to it some definite effect. You must search for the intendment of the framers in creating this office of pro tempore President of the Senate. When you do so, I am clearly persuaded that their purpose was to make him a permanent officer. Permanent how long? Clearly during the absence of the Vice-President. But is that the entire limitation? No, sir! The Constitution says in addition during the period the Vice-President is discharging the duties of President of the United States in the event of the death or removal by impeachment of the latter-named officer. I admit that the tenure of the President pro tempore is of uncertain duration. Still its tenure is fixed and determined, not by the Senate, but by the Constitution; not for any specified time, but during the absence or death of the Vice-President or while he is discharging the duties of President. If the Vice-President returns to the Senate and takes the chair, the tenure of the President pro tempore is determined and ceases, and a new election is legal. If the Vice-President never returns, then the President pro tempore continues until his term of Senator expires; hence the act of 1792 by its provisions recognizes this construction of the clause as the true intendment of the framers of that instrument. Hence a uniform series of precedents for seventy years in recognizing the President pro tempore of the Senate during the absence of the Vice-President and until his return as its permanent presiding officer, not removable except for cause.

Mr. President, if I am not in error some members of the convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States were members of the Congress which passed the act of 1792. If this be true it only strengthens the construction of this clause insisted on by me. If any members of that convention were in Congress in 1792, (of which I am not positive,) the act is persuasive evidence of what they thought upon this subject. That act declares:

> That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, shall act as President of the United States until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

That Congress clearly legislated upon the assumption that the President pro tempore was a permanent officer during the absence of the Vice-President.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose, in such an event as has been suggested, the President pro tempore of the Senate should enter upon the execution of the duties of President of the United States and his term as Senator should expire before the end of the presidential term, is it the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky that he would continue to be acting ex officio as President of the United States, although the term of his senatorship, by virtue of which he came to be President pro tempore, had expired?

Mr. STEVENSON. I should think that he would continue to be President until the governors of the several States had, after being notified by the Secretary of State of the death of the President, caused an election of an electoral college and a new election of President had taken place under the provisions of the act of Congress. The strongest answer against the argument of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] as I think, is to be found in the extraordinary results which might practically follow his construction.

The act of 1792, in the event of the death of the President and Vice-President, makes the President pro tempore President of the United States until a new election can be held in accordance with the provisions of that act.

Does the Senator from Indiana sincerely believe that the Senate of the United States could remove at its pleasure the President pro tempore of the Senate after he became President of the United States? If the argument in favor of the right of the Senate to remove the President pro tempore at its pleasure be correct, the right to remove him after he was President would follow. If not, why not? Indeed, I understood the honorable Senator to claim that this right of the Senate to remove its President pro tempore would extend to him even if he was President of the United States. In support of that postulate, he insisted that in some of the States a lieutenant-governor who had become governor still presided over the senate of the State when the State constitution contained provisions somewhat similar to that which we are now considering. He cited Arkansas, and was sustained in his statement by the Senator from Arkansas that such was the usage in his State. I shall certainly take no issue with the Senator from Arkansas as to what the provision of the constitution of that State is, or what has been the usage under it. But I think I can say, both to the Senate and to the country, if the Arkansas constitution contains such a provision, and the president pro tempore of the Arkansas senate after being governor still presided over the senate, that out of the thirty-seven States which constitute this Union Arkansas is the solitary State where such an anomaly exists. The case cited by the Senator from Indiana of the president of the senate becoming governor of the State occurred in Kentucky. Indeed, it occurred while I discharged the executive duties of that Commonwealth. I was elected lieutenant-governor on the State ticket in 1867 with Hon. John L. Helm, who was elected governor. Governor Helm died within a few days after taking the oath, at his own home in Hardin County, and without ever reaching the seat of government. By his death I as lieutenant-governor became acting governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky and acted as such for one year, when I was elected governor. There was then no lieutenant-governor, the law having made no provision for the election of one. The lieutenant-governor, by the terms of the constitution of Kentucky, is elected by the people and presides over the senate. When I was elected governor the senate of Kentucky elected Hon. P. H. Leslie president of that body, who, when I was elected to this body, was qualified as governor and served out my unexpired term. Had the people of Kentucky been informed that Governor Leslie after qualifying as governor could still have presided in the senate, or that he was subject to removal from the office of governor except for cause, I am sure they would have been confounded.

Mr. President, any construction of any clause of the Constitution of the United States, or of the constitution of any State, which would confer upon the Senate of the United States the right to remove at its pleasure the President pro tempore after he had become President of the United States, without cause and at its pleasure, or which would in a State authorize the senate to remove the president pro tempore after he had become invested with the executive duties as governor or acting governor, must be erroneous. Such a construction carries its own refutation. It would lead to mischief which could not be estimated. It was against such results that the Federal Constitution, in my judgment, intended to provide.

The intimation of the Senator from Indiana that the President pro tempore of the Senate, after becoming President of the United States, might still preside in the Senate is novel and extraordinary. It seems to me unsupported by law and unsustained by usage. Such a doctrine finds no support in the usage of the State governments, unless in Arkansas.

Mr. THURMAN. If it does not interrupt the argument of my friend from Kentucky, I can name two instances in my own State in which the governorship of the State devolved on the speaker of the senate, and in each of those cases it was decided that the speaker accepting the office of governor vacated his seat as senator.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the constitution devolve the duties on him?

Mr. THURMAN. In the very words of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. That he shall act as governor?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; the words are copied from the Constitution of the United States. It was so held for a plain reason, too plain for argument, that it is impossible that the legislative and executive powers or the judicial and executive powers of government can be vested in the same individual.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have already cited the provision of the Kentucky constitution upon this subject and the uniform usage under it. I had never supposed that in any State where by the provisions of the constitution and laws the president of the senate became acting governor he could exercise at the same time his functions as senator. Without an examination of the constitutions of the several States, I hazard the opinion that Arkansas is the only State that tolerates the exercise of the office of governor and senator at one and the same time. I have no doubt it will be found that most of the constitutions of the States contain provisions on the subject similar to the clause of the Constitution of the United States which we are now discussing, and I have as little doubt that where the provisions are the same in the State as in the Federal Constitution the same uniform construction and usage have prevailed in all the State governments as to the office of lieutenant-governor and president of the senate that have for seventy years prevailed under the Federal Government.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I would call the attention of the Senator to a case which perhaps he has not heard of, but nevertheless the authority of it will not be the less because it is strange to him. The constitution of Louisiana declares in so many words that in case of the death of the lieutenant-governor the president of the senate shall become lieutenant-governor. A gentleman by the name of Pinchback was president of the senate when the lieutenant-governor died. He became the lieutenant-governor, as it was understood, and afterward became the governor of the State upon the impeachment of the governor. In the mean time his term as senator expired, but he continued to act as governor after that time until Governor Kellogg was installed.

The democratic party of Louisiana, who were generally sound upon constitutional law, [laughter,] took the ground that when Pinchback's time as a Senator expired he was out of office, and had no right any longer to act as governor. On the other side it was contended that, inasmuch as the constitution of Louisiana had not simply devolved the duties of lieutenant-governor on the president of the senate but had said in so many words that he should become lieutenant-governor, therefore he was lieutenant-governor, and no reference could be had to the expiration of his office as senator. The case went before the supreme court of Louisiana, and that court decided, if I remember correctly, in favor of Pinchback, putting it upon the ground that the constitution had not simply devolved the duties of lieutenant-governor, but had thrown the office upon him, and therefore his tenure as lieutenant-governor no longer depended upon his tenure as senator of the State. If these facts are not familiar to my friend from Kentucky, I can refresh him by reference to the documents.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thank the Senator for his kindness, but I am exceedingly familiar with Pinchback's case. [Laughter.] I sincerely trust that we have done with Pinchback and that the Senate is about to have a Louisiana Senator—regularly and legally chosen—a Senator of pure gold, not Pinchback. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him just here which he thinks was the true construction in the case cited by him, the democratic or the republican construction, as to Pinchback's tenure of office? I should like to hear his answer.

Mr. MORTON. I will answer my friend. I think the republican construction there was right, as it generally is, [laughter,] because it proceeded expressly upon the ground that the constitution of Louisiana had not simply devolved the duties of the lieutenant-governor upon the president of the senate, but had in express terms made him lieutenant-governor, and after that he was lieutenant-governor without reference to the fact that he had ceased to be a member of the senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. If that construction was right in the case cited in Louisiana, why should not the same construction prevail now? The attempted distinction between devolving on the lieutenant-governor the duties of the office and investing him with the office in the event of death or resignation is more specious than solid. Besides, the President pro tempore of the Senate, on the death of the President and Vice-President, becomes President, and so remains until the election provided for by the act takes place. I insist, therefore, that the Pinchback case is directly against the construction contended for by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Senator will allow me to continue for a moment the line of thought I am now on, I will hear and answer his question with pleasure. As to the citation of any opinion of the supreme court of Louisiana in the time of the oppression and wrong and revolution by the Kellogg government, I regard it of no judicial force whatever. If right in the instance alluded to, it was by accident. The judges were mere puppets and instruments of the Kellogg and Durell usurpation—the quasi judicial apologists for fraud and usurpation. In support of this statement I have only to refer to a judicial decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, where a railroad sale was set aside, in an elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Strong, for fraud and perfidy committed by a man who was one of the judges of the supreme court of Louisiana at the period alluded to.

Mr. President, all that I desire is to ascertain and adopt the true construction of this clause of the Constitution as understood by its framers, irrespective of party. I will hear from the Senator from Vermont the question he desires to propound.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says, referring to the constitution of Louisiana, that that is precisely what he contends about this provision. I was about to ask him if his attention had been drawn to the difference in language between the two constitutions?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir. I did not refer to the constitution of Louisiana. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] interposed the construction of the constitution of Louisiana in the Pinchback case, which I did not refer to as an authority and which I had not recently examined.

But, Mr. President, the implication arising from the law of 1792, already referred to, which makes the President pro tempore of the Senate in certain contingencies President of the United States, is strong presumptive evidence that the Congress who passed it regarded the office of President pro tempore of the Senate a fixed and continuing one. At a later period, in 1861, Senator Collamer construed this clause in the same way. Hear him:

> With these views, I have prepared the resolution declaring that the President pro tempore of the Senate elected in the absence of the Vice-President shall, while a Senator, remain President pro tempore, and officiate from time to time whenever the Vice-President is absent, until another is elected. I think that is the true exposition of the Constitution, necessarily implied by the law that I have referred to, and the only practicable method of getting along so as to avoid going without a President pro tempore in vacation, and having constant elections and re-elections every time the Vice-President goes out and in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What did the Senate do about the proposition of my predecessor? They did not agree to it at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. The resolution was not acted on. I am, however, citing the opinion of an eminent judge and a good lawyer from Vermont in support of my construction and against that of the committee. I refer to the legal opinion of so eminent a jurist as Hon. James A. Bayard for the same purpose. There was no dissent to the opinions of these distinguished gentlemen on the construction of this clause of the Constitution, and their construction was opposed to that of the committee. Both Judge Collamer and Mr. Bayard agreed that the office of President pro tempore was a continuing one. They differed only as to the point of time when the duration of the office ceased.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another fact which has had some influence upon my mind. I observe, in the past usages of the Senate for a period of seventy years, that toward the close of every session of the Senate the Vice-President would notify this body that on a certain day named he would vacate the chair, and thereupon the Senate proceeded to elect a President pro tempore. If the Senate could elect at any time, this would seem to have been unnecessary. Why? I will tell you. Because the Senate believed that the Constitution intended that the office of President pro tempore was a continuing one, and provided against any hiatus or interregnum in the Government of the United States. They intended that in the event of the death of the President and Vice-President, the President pro tempore of the Senate should be a continuing officer. Such has been the practice, such has been the law, and such should be the construction, so invariably adhered to for so many years.

No Senator respects more than I do the present Presiding Officer of the Senate; I believe him competent and impartial. When I heard of the death of the Vice-President I had not supposed that the question would ever be raised that Senator FERRY was not the continuing Presiding Officer of the Senate, and would continue so long as his term of Senator continued. Had the President died before Congress convened, I had as little doubt that Senator would have been President of the United States. If so, how can it be that the Senate of the United States could have possessed any power to have displaced him? And yet, if the construction now insisted upon be the correct one, the Senate would possess that power, and the President pro tempore of the Senate, after being invested with the office of President of the United States, might have been displaced by the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I beg to call the attention of my friend to the fact that Judge Collamer's remarks do not bear out his position, and that the question he was discussing was not the question now before the Senate. Judge Collamer offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President pro tempore of the Senate, elected in the absence of the Vice-President, holds his office, while a member of the Senate, until another is elected, and executes the duties thereof whenever the Vice-President is absent.

He wanted to fix the rule so that when once a President pro tempore was elected his office should not be vacated by the Vice-President coming back, but that he should continue, and when the Vice-President went away again he should take the chair by virtue of the first election. He did not pretend that that was the law, but he wanted to make an order of the Senate fixing it so that they would not have to elect a new President pro tempore every time the Vice-President was absent; and he said:

The object of this resolution is to declare what I have understood to be really the law. It has been the practice of late years to understand that when a President pro tempore is elected in the absence of the Vice-President, those words "elected in the absence of the Vice-President" limit not only the occasion of his election, but the term and tenure of his office; and that when the particular absence of the Vice-President on which occasion he was elected ceases his election ceases also.

He states what had been the understanding and what had been the law, and he thought it expedient to provide that when once a President pro tempore was elected he should continue to hold the office notwithstanding the return of the Vice-President, thus rendering a new election unnecessary; but he never intimated for one moment that it was not in the power of the Senate to change the presiding officer. That is the point here.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am so often interrupted I fear I shall never get through. The Senator from Indiana insists that Judge Collamer never intimated that the Senate did not possess the power to displace the President pro tempore at pleasure. I beg the Senator's pardon. I appeal to the debate to bear me out. I now turn to it. Judge Collamer said:

The object of this resolution is to declare what I have understood to be really the law.

If he believed, with the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate already possessed that power of removal at pleasure, why any declaratory resolution on the subject? Especially, how could he with such an opinion offer his resolution?

Mr. MORTON. I will say to my friend that Judge Collamer intimated that he thought the President pro tempore could hold, notwithstanding the Vice-President returned, and be the President pro tempore during his second absence, just as we have held that the beginning of a new session does not vacate the office of President pro tempore, but he continues to hold until his successor is chosen. But he does not intimate there that the Senate cannot make a change; at least, he does not in that part of the speech the Senator read.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not pretend to read the whole speech. I only referred to the opinion and position of Judge Collamer in support of the construction I mentioned. The Senator from Indiana would be better prepared to know what Judge Collamer's position was by reading his whole speech, instead of authoritatively insisting what his views were before reading it, and I think I can show that it is the logical sequence from what Judge Collamer did say that he utterly disbelieved in the power of the Senate to displace a President pro tempore without cause and at its own pleasure. But that the Senator from Indiana and myself may not differ, I will again refer to what Judge Collamer did say.

I quote from the debate:

The object of this resolution is to declare what I have understood to be really the law. It has been the practice of late years to understand that when a President pro tempore is elected in the absence of the Vice-President, those words "elected in the absence of the Vice-President" limit not only the occasion of his election but the term and tenure of his office; and that when the particular absence of the Vice-President on which occasion he was elected ceases, his election ceases also.

That is done and can be done only upon one construction of the language of the Constitution. After speaking in the previous clause of the Vice-President's presiding over the Senate, the Constitution provides that "the Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President." Observe the words. The pending question is upon their construction.

It arose in the Collamer debate as it does now. The Senator from Indiana cannot misunderstand that. What, then, is the true purport of the words in the Constitution which Judge Collamer cited? Hear him: "The question arises on the construction of those words, that 'the Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President.'"

He goes on to say:

Undoubtedly the Senate must elect the President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. That settles the occasion of the election; but the question still remains, does the office cease when that occasion passes away? In order to test this, I have looked into the early practice.

It seems to me that if an election be made to last only while the Vice-President is at that time absent, the election to the officce must cease with the session. It is an absurdity to talk about—

Let the Senator from Indiana listen and tell me what Judge Collamer meant. It is an absurdity even to intimate—the absence of the Vice-President when the Senate is not sitting.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator asks what Senator Collamer meant by that. Now, if the Senator from Kentucky has shown anything in this Collamer discussion of the power of the Senate to make the change, I have not heard it. It does not so far; it may further on; but it has not come yet.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know that anything Judge Collamer would or did say or anything I can cite would convince the Senator from Indiana; but certainly he can never doubt the opinion of Judge Collamer upon the continuance of the office of President pro tempore from one session to another in the absence of the Vice-President. But let me continue the quotation from Judge Collamer's speech. He continues:

No man can with propriety say that a member or the vice-president of a body is absent when owing to the adjournment of the body he cannot be present. Absence from a body implies that the body is sitting. It cannot be said that a man is absent when the body itself is not present If the Vice-President chooses, he has a right to put an end to the time of holding the office by the President pro tempore by coming back and taking the chair, which it is said he may do at any day during the session. He cannot come back to do that in the vacation. You deprive him of the power of coming here then. The truth is, as I view it, that the absence must be an absence from the sitting body; and the moment the body ceases its session no one can be said to be absent from it after that. It is to me a sort of paradox to talk about the Vice-President being absent or any member being absent after we have adjourned. Neither the Vice-President nor anybody else can be absent from the Senate when the Senate is not sitting.

That this is not the practical construction of the Constitution (that is to say, that when a President pro tempore is appointed his office ceases with the session, as it must if it is limited to the time of the absence) is shown by the uniform practice of the Senate for the last seventy years. The practice has been to make an election near the close of the session, and the Vice-President retires for the purpose of allowing a President pro tempore to be elected. What for? That the office may continue in vacation, and, with two exceptions, the uniform practice has been, as appears by the journals, that when the next session commences, if the Vice-President is not here, the President pro tempore takes the seat. There have been two exceptions where the Senate elected a different person. That proves nothing, because the Senate, no doubt, can elect a new one at any time.

Again, sir, the law which provides, in accordance with the Constitution, who shall perform the duties of President of the United States in case of the death or resignation of both the President and Vice-President, declares that the President pro tempore of the Senate shall officiate; or, if there be no President pro tempore, the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is very observable that that law necessarily implies that the Congress which passed it understood the place of President pro tempore to be a continuing office—

That is not the rule at present—

That, when elected, he remained in until another was elected. True, it might fall out that he might die; and so provision was made for the Speaker of the House of Representatives; but the necessary implication from the law is that the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is a continuing office. It was so understood then, and I wish it merely to be so understood now.—Congressional Globe, first session, Thirty-seventh Congress, pages 436, 437.

I want it put in black and white that this office is a continuing office. Yet the gentleman tells the Senate that Mr. Collamer did not believe that this was a continuing office.

Mr. MORTON. I think I have heard the reading correctly, and I ask the Senator if Mr. Collamer does not, while speaking about its being a continuing office, recognize the power of the Senate to make a change at any time?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have read what Judge Collamer said, and the Senate comprehends it. I continue the quotation.

He said, in reply to Mr. Bayard:

But, to my mind, the gentleman's argument is what we lawyers call the petitio principii. He assumes, to begin with, that the limitation of the time and term of the office is the same as the occasion of appointment. The Constitution provides that the Senate may appoint a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. Now, the Senator assumes that he ceases to be President pro tempore when the Vice-President comes back.

That was what Mr. Bayard insisted upon and what Mr. Collamer denied—the latter urging that the term of the President pro tempore continued on the death or absence of the Vice-President during his entire term as Senator, covering the entire term of the office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to ask the Senator whether the office of a judge of one of the United States courts is not a continuing office, and yet whether that office may not be changed? not at the pleasure of the President, to be sure. But take another case, which is more to the point; take any one of the thousands of internal-revenue officers. The office continues all the time, but at the pleasure of the President of the United States, with that of the Senate; I will say, together. It may be without, but I will pass that question. The person who occupies the office may be changed every week if we like; the office continues; but the right of a particular person to hold it is quite a different thing, I submit to my friend.

Mr. STEVENSON. My opinion is that this Senate can no more touch the President pro tempore when he becomes President than it could displace President Grant; and I utterly repudiate the statement of the honorable Senator from Indiana, made, perhaps, in the absence of the Senator from Vermont, that after the President pro tempore becomes President of the United States he can still preside over the Senate; that the Senate can still remove him. No, sir; the absurd consequences to which the proposed construction of the committee might and does lead seem to me to be an unanswerable argument against its correctness.

I think it is a matter of the highest moment that the Senate should adopt some uniform construction of this clause and act under it. This report utterly repudiates the construction and practice which have prevailed for seventy years. I think it a wise practice and the correct one. I shall regret to see a new usage prevail. Still, if the majority have determined on it, like other innovations of recent years, I acquiesce.

I can see possible mischief and danger in the new construction; none has ever occurred during the old usage. I venerate this Constitution of our fathers, and I desire it to stand. I want all its guards of protection and of public and individual liberty of defense to remain unimpaired. It has been assailed and violated and its effective power almost paralyzed amid the fires and blood of civil revolution. But that has passed away.

I devoutly thank God that a soberer and a steadier feeling in the popular heart is being aroused to guard it from further violation. The people are beginning to feel that there is no power above the Constitution and no protection outside of it. It is the only ark of their political and social safety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. OGLESBY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to indefinitely postpone the third resolution.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to say one word on the particular character of the motion. An indefinite postponement of this resolution would be a declaration that the doctrine of it is not recognized by the Senate, or at least that there is a doubt about it. This resolution being now before the Senate, and growing up out of the inquiry submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in my opinion it ought to be decided. We have decided two other points, and those decisions will be quoted as precedents hereafter, and I think it is important now that we should pass fairly and squarely upon this resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No dodging. Do not let us have any evasion about it now.

Mr. MORTON. Let us have no evasion nor leave any doubt about it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I think I should not have risen again upon this question but for that word "evasion." What "evasion" is there in indefinitely postponing a resolution when there is no case before the Senate giving rise to any such resolution and requiring us to pass it? We have passed two resolutions very properly, because the case had arisen; but as to this resolution there is no case before the Senate making it necessary to express any opinion upon it one way or the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator how a case arises under the first and second resolutions any more than under this one?

Mr. THURMAN. Because a question had been made in respect to the right of the President pro tempore of the Senate to take the chair at this session. The question was made and submitted to the committee, and it was very proper that we should know whether the officer who is presiding over us, or he who assumed to be an officer, had authority so to preside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But my friend has forgotten that since the introduction of the original resolution upon the subject the Senate by a unanimous vote declared, after rejecting an amendment which was offered to a resolution—

That Mr. THOMAS W. FERRY, a Senator from the State of Michigan, be the President of the Senate until January 7, 1876, and until a fresh appointment shall be made.

So that no more question existed yesterday respecting the right of the Senator from Michigan to exercise the duties of President pro tempore than there can exist respecting the right of my friend and mine to exercise our duties to-day.

Mr. THURMAN. I think if I were to go into the history of this question it would be seen that there is a very material difference. The Senator from Vermont introduced a resolution to go into an election of President pro tempore on the 7th day of January. I think that was the first movement. That I suggested should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It was so referred ultimately. After that, and before the recess took place, the Senator from Vermont, out of abundant caution, it seems, introduced another resolution, that the Senator from Michigan should continue to be President of the Senate until another election, or something of that kind; and it was passed to gratify him, I believe, for I am quite sure some of the Senators thought it was wholly unnecessary, as, for instance, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who declared that he considered it wholly unnecessary. Yet, if any Senator had any doubts on that subject, there seemed to be no objection to the resolution being passed, and it was passed without any debate or discussion whatsoever. I do not think that alters the case. Now, we have decided that the Senator from Michigan continued to be President pro tempore of the Senate notwithstanding the session at which he was chosen had expired. We have settled that question. We have settled the question also that the death of the Vice-President did not put an end to the duration of the office of the President pro tempore. Those are all the questions we need settle in order to affirm the right of the President pro tempore to hold his office; but how long he is entitled to hold it is another question, and cannot come up properly before the Senate unless a motion be made to go into another election. That is the point which I make. It is very easy to bring this question before the Senate. If the Senator from Vermont desires it, he can very easily bring it before the Senate by a resolution to go into an election. Then we shall be compelled to decide the question; but until that be done, whatever we may say now is deciding the question before the case arises.

This is my reason for moving to indefinitely postpone the third resolution. I think it is a good and a sufficient reason. I have no desire to evade this question. I am ready to vote upon it. I said the day before yesterday that I was in some doubt about it. I cannot say that I am entirely free from doubt now. I am willing to confess that my impression was, without having examined the question, in favor of the report of the committee; but subsequent reflection, a more critical examination of the Constitution, and the arguments that have been adduced by those who have spoken against the report, have changed my opinion. I think that the weight of argument is against the power of the Senate to make the change. And although this matter has been argued already, perhaps as long as the Senate desires to hear argument upon it, I venture to trespass upon the attention of the Senate for a few moments while I very briefly state the reasons that bring me to this conclusion.

In doing so I may notice another question that has been mooted here, although it is wholly outside of the question before the Senate, or at least there is no necessity for deciding it, but upon which my views are perfectly clear; and that is, what would be the status of the President pro tempore of the Senate if the duties of the presidential office should devolve upon him under the law of 1792? Upon that question I do not really see how there can be any two opinions. I think it is as clear as anything can be, that if such an event were to take place and he were to accept the discharge of the duties of President of the United States, he would cease to be a Senator. I cannot conceive anything more incongruous, more opposite to the genius and spirit and provisions of the Constitution, which separate the departments of the Government into executive, legislative, and judicial, than to suppose a man could at one and the same time exercise the functions of President of the United States and be the President of the Senate of the United States, entitled to all the rights and privileges of a Senator. That would be vesting in one and the same individual powers wholly different and wholly inconsistent with each other, legislative powers as a Senator, presiding powers as the President of the Senate, and executive powers as the Executive of the United States.

It is against the rules of this body to allude to an opinion of the President of the United States unless it has been officially communicated to us; or at least it is against the rules of this body to say what the President will or will not do in regard to a matter of legislation before us upon which he has not officially expressed an opinion. Why so? Because the executive power should not be felt in this Senate to influence the votes of its members. The same rule obtains in the other House. And yet there are some Senators who seem to suppose that the very man clothed with the office of President can come into the Senate, preside over its deliberations, take part in its debates, say what he will do and what he will not do in his executive character. I cannot conceive of anything more inconsistent than that. No, sir; if the duties of the office devolve upon the President pro tempore of the Senate and he sees fit to accept them, then he ceases to be a Senator. If he does not cease to be a Senator, one of two things must happen: either that he can at one and the same time discharge legislative functions as a Senator and be the supreme Executive of the United States, or if he cannot discharge his legislative functions as a Senator then his State is shorn of one-half of its representation upon this floor. That is the effect of it. You must say that he can come here and act as Senator, take part in our debates, vote on the question of passing a bill over his own veto, preside over our deliberations, influence us by his opinion as the Executive of the nation, or you must say that he cannot do that; he must leave this Chamber; he must take no part in its deliberations. If you say at the same time that he continues to be a Senator, then by an act of the Congress of the United States you have deprived his State of one of its Senators on this floor. This view will not bear examination at all.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The act of Congress which is under discussion, like the Constitution on which it is founded, if it is founded on the Constitution, provides not only for the death and removal of the President and Vice-President, but for the inability of both those officers to act. Now I beg to put to the Senator from Ohio this question: Suppose the acting President, the Vice-President who has come to be, were ill for a time, or insane for a time, which, I take it, would be one of the cases of inability here, and the President of the Senate pro tempore should enter upon the discharge of the duties of President and continue and complete that discharge in one week, and the President, himself, resumes his health and the duties of his office, does the Senator from Ohio say that that week of service would have put an end to the tenure of office of the Senator?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator had not interrupted me, I should have noticed that.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not mean to interrupt my friend, but I am seeking light, and as I have interrupted him, if he will pardon me one moment, suppose——

Mr. THURMAN. I heard all the arguments the Senator can make on this question thirty years ago in this Chamber.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not know the Senator was here thirty years ago. Had I known that, my respect for venerable men would have prevented me from interrupting him. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. I thank the Senator for his respect, and I will modify my remark by saying that it was thirty-five years ago.

Mr. CONKLING. Thirty-five years ago! The Senator's age is as great as his discretion. But now, if he will pardon me, does he mean to tell us that, if these duties had been devolved upon the Chief-Justice of the United States and he should have discharged them for a week during the inability of the President, he would cease to be Chief-Justice by so doing? I do not know that he is not right; but I am seeking, in genuine good faith, light on the subject.

Mr. THURMAN. Undoubtedly so; I did not intend to be discourteous to the Senator when I told him that he had interrupted me by asking a question which I would have considered, although this whole debate on this question is really aside from the resolution before us; and I should not have said anything about it, but that I did not wish to sit in silence and hear opinions such as those expressed by the Senator from Indiana on this question without entering my dissent. I do say, in answer to the Senator from New York, that a man cannot be a Senator of the United States and at the same time discharge the duties of President of the United States one minute; he cannot be Chief Justice of the United States and discharge the duties of President one minute, consistently with the Constitution of the United States. That is what I mean to say.

I said that thirty-five years ago I heard this question discussed; discussed by great men, and discussed in the Senate of the United States. I was not in the Senate. I was too young, or the people had not discovered my merits then. [Laughter.] It was on the occasion of the death of General Harrison, and the question was whether Mr. Tyler had become President of the United States. When a motion was made in the Senate to appoint a committee—the usual motion on the commencement of the session—"to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that both Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication that he might be pleased to make," a Senator from Ohio moved to amend instead of saying "the President of the United States" by saying "the Vice-President of the United States acting as President." That gave rise to a very interesting discussion; and the result of that discussion was, I believe, a vote, by a large majority, to retain the resolution in its original form, upon the ground that upon the death of the President the Vice-President became actually President of the United States. It was argued in support of the amendment that there was a distinction between the case of the death of the President and a temporary disability, and that it could not be said that the Vice-President became President of the United States where the actual President was only under temporary disability, because that would be to have two Presidents of the United States at one and the same time. It is precisely the same argument that the Senator from New York now suggests. It was said then that this clause in regard to the powers and duties devolving on the Vice-President is precisely the same in respect to death or to inability to serve. Let me turn to that clause:

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

They are all put in the same clause, and the language is "what officer shall then act as President." I am speaking now from recollection, for I do not think I have read that debate for many years; but it made a great impression on my young mind at that time. The opinion expressed by leading Senators who took part in that debate was that in the case of death it is plain, and in the case of removal from office it is plain, and in the case of resignation it is plain; all those cases put an end to the official character of the President; and it was only in case of his inability to serve (it might be from insanity, or from imprisonment, or from some temporary cause—sickness a Senator suggests, and that might well be) that there could be any question. The weight of opinion, as I recollect it, expressed then was that in such a case of inability, as in case of captivity and imprisonment—if, for instance, Mr. Lincoln had been captured and imprisoned by the confederates during the late civil war, his powers would have been in abeyance during that captivity, and the Vice-President for the time being would have been the President of the United States; and no order given by Mr. Lincoln from his dungeon in a Southern State, if he had been in one, or in some fortress there, could be obeyed as the order of the President of the United States; but, the powers of the real President being in abeyance by reason of imprisonment or inability to discharge his duties, the Vice-President for the time being would have been the President of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. I want to call the attention of my friend from Ohio, because I am interested in this part of the discussion; although it is not involved in the passage of this resolution; and as he has brought it here——

Mr. THURMAN. I did not.

Mr. MORTON. Or rather, he brought it here before. His argument is that the President pro tempore of the Senate in the case of the death of the President of the United States would become the President of the United States in fact and in law. Now, I dissent from that. The argument in the case of the Vice-President, where the President should die or become disabled, is not in point. The Constitution makes the difference:

> In case of removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same—

that is, the office—

> shall devolve on the Vice-President.

Mr. THURMAN. O no! the last antecedent is "duties"—"powers and duties."

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator supposes now that the office itself devolved and not the powers and duties.

Mr. MORTON. I will read it just as it is.

Mr. THURMAN. "To discharge the powers and duties of the said office."

Mr. MORTON. "The same;" that is, I take it, the office. That is what the Senator himself argues.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the grammatical argument of the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to point out the difference in the language of the Constitution:

> The same shall devolve on the Vice-President; and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President.

That is what it is. We have very frequent illustrations of this kind. I believe the law provides that when a Secretary of one of the Departments shall be disabled or absent an Assistant Secretary, or some other officer, shall act as Secretary. He does not cease to be assistant, but for the time being, under the law, he performs the duties of the chief office and acts in that capacity. For example, the charter of a city provides that when the mayor is sick or otherwise disabled or absent, the first justice of the peace in the city may act as mayor. The justice does not become mayor, but the duties of the office are temporarily devolved upon him, and he acts in that capacity. The other man does not cease to be mayor. In the absence of the Secretary of the Treasury, the assistant performs his duties, but the one does not cease to be Secretary of the Treasury nor does the other become Secretary; and in this case the Constitution says that Congress may provide what officer shall act as President. That may be temporarily or it may not be.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not find much light on this question from the illustration of mayors of cities and corporate villages in the State of Indiana or the State of Ohio. It seeems to me that it is a question which depends on the Constitution of the United States, and is quite irrespective of any of those municipal laws to which the Senator has referred. I did not rise, however, to argue that question, but only to say that I, for one, dissent from the views expressed by the Senator from Indiana in the first remarks which he submitted this morning on this question. I think when the office devolves on the President pro tempore he ceases to be Senator, becomes President, and holds the office of President until the expiration of the term or until another President is elected. I may be wrong about it; I only state my opinion. That is my judgment, because I cannot in any way reconcile it to my mind that a man can at one and the same time discharge the duties of President of the United States and be a Senator in Congress, entitled to take a seat on this floor and to participate in our deliberations with all the powers of a Senator; nor can I reconcile it to myself to say that any act of Congress can deprive a State of one-half of its representation on this floor by making a Senator President of the United States, and at the same time leaving him a Senator in name but without power to act as a Senator. That is all that I desire to say upon that branch of the subject.

Upon the question that is immediately before the Senate, and as to which I have said that I was not entirely clear, but that the impression of my mind was in favor of the views of the minority of the committee, I wish to say a very few words indeed.

> The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

I wish the attention of the Senator from Indiana for one moment. The Senator says that the power conferred in this clause is precisely the same in respect to the President of the Senate that it is in respect to "the other officers," and that if it is competent for the Senate to remove its Secretary, or its Chief Clerk, or its Sergeant-at-Arms, it follows necessarily that it has a like power to remove the President pro tempore. I submit to him that he is entirely mistaken in that. There is not one word in this clause that by any implication whatever fixes the duration of the office of any officer of the Senate except the President pro tempore. There is not one word in the clause which, either expressly or by any implication, fixes the term of office of the Secretary of the Senate, of the Chief Clerk of the Senate, of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or of any of those officers who are strictly officers of the Senate. But when you come to the President pro tempore, there are most pregnant words that do intimate, that do raise a fair implication, if they do not express it in fact, that he is to hold during the entire absence of the Vice-President, and, if that absence be caused by death, as in the case now before us, that then he must continue to hold as long as he is a member of the body, unless, in the mean time, another Vice-President has been chosen. Let us see how this matter is:

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, &c.

The Senate shall choose their other officers.

Why was the clause "the Senate shall choose their other officers" put in at all? The reason of it is very obvious. You will find a like provision in regard to the House of Representatives. It was to give each body the absolute power to choose its own officers. Just for the same reason that each House is made the sole judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, so the choice of its own immediate servants is vested in each House, and it is to prevent the choice of officers of the Senate, or officers of the House being made a subject-matter of legislation, being governed by law, or being conferred upon any executive authority. It is for that reason alone that the clause is put in here that "the Senate shall choose their other officers." Then the Constitution goes on and says: "And also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States."

If the Senator from Indiana is right, why was not this clause condensed so as to say "the Senate shall choose their other officers, and when necessary a President pro tempore?" Why was it not put in those few words? Where was the necessity of putting in words that import a term for which that President is to hold his office? If the Senator from Indiana and the majority of the committee are correct, the whole object would have been accomplished by saying: "The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore when necessary." That would have left him in the power of the Senate. But, instead of saying in those few words that the Senate should have the power to elect a President pro tempore, they go on to say "and a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President." And that is not all: "Or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States."

It does look as if the plain import of this language was that there is to be such an officer, and it is admitted he is an officer, for, if he is not, he could not become President under the act of 1792, and that act would be unconstitutional. There is to be such an officer as a President pro tempore of the Senate, and that officer is elected for an absence of the Vice-President, and if that absence is to be continuous, as in the case of his becoming President of the United States upon the death, resignation, or removal from office of the President, then that Senator, thus President pro tempore, is to hold for the whole term.

That is the natural import of this language, as it seems to me upon further reflection. In view of the language of the Constitution and in view of the fact that it seems to have been the idea of the framers of the Constitution that the presiding officer of this body should have a certain independent status, a certain permanency of tenure of office, and with the strong reasons which have been given favoring this permanency of tenure, I cannot bring myself ultimately to the conclusion that this is an office held durante beneplacito; that we are to turn our presiding officer out one day and put somebody else in; and that, owing to some casual change of majority or change of feeling in the Senate, we are to reverse the thing the next day and re-instate the old officer. I know that there is very little to be gained by supposing extreme cases. There is very little to be gained by supposing that the Senate would do so improper a thing; and yet it might be done in times of high party excitement.

Then, I think, Mr. President, that there is great force in what was said by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] If you say that the President pro tempore can be changed at the will of the Senate, and the House of Representatives should take the opposite view of it, and the office of President of the United States should devolve on the President of the Senate, you might have a conflict between the two Houses as to who was the Chief Executive Magistrate. If, for instance, we were to change our President pro tempore, elect some one else in his stead, and (this not being a matter of the special privileges of the Senate, upon which our judgment is conclusive—for upon it depends who shall be President of the United States) if the House of Representatives should take the opposite view and say, "You have improperly elected a man; you have violated the Constitution by electing a man when there was no vacancy and when you had no power to change your presiding officer," we can see that there would be a conflict immediately between the two Houses. That may be an extreme case, too—that is to say, a case not very likely to occur—and yet it is a case so likely to occur that it has been thought necessary to provide by law for the event of the death of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, and it is provided for in the Constitution also. The Constitution contemplates that both President and Vice-President may die or their offices become vacant, and it requires Congress to provide for such a contingency, and Congress has provided for it; so that it is not reasoning from extreme cases or improbable hypotheses to say such a case may arise; and, seeing that it may arise, it is possible there may be this conflict between the two Houses if the opinion advocated by the majority of the committee shall prevail. The other opinion, that which makes the office of President pro tempore permanent as long as the Vice-President is absent, removes any possibility of danger of a conflict.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, I have very few words to offer the Senate, but I have some thoughts which have occurred to me during the progress of this discussion which I feel disposed to present. The question is whether an officer chosen by this body pro tempore, for the time, is an officer for all time. I find no difficulty in coming to a conclusion upon this point; and it is for the reason that I find no difficulty in reaching a conclusion upon several points suggested that I desire now to offer what I have to say.

If the President pro tempore of this body was called to discharge the duties of President of the United States by reason of the death of the President to-day, at this moment, he would at once have gone beyond the reach of this body, to discharge duties devolving upon him under the law; his responsibility to the Senate would have been enlarged; he would have become at once responsible to the people of the United States, who have provided by law that this officer, upon a certain contingency, shall assume certain other duties and discharge a certain other office. He could then only be reached through the avenue and under the law that had been provided for reaching the President of the United States in case he failed to discharge his duties faithfully. He could not be removed by this body, for the good reason that he was no longer responsible to this body; but, under the operation of the Constitution and the law, he would have succeeded to the discharge of higher and more important duties; he would have succeeded to the discharge of the functions of a separate and independent branch of the Government; he would be no longer dependent on the legislative department of the Government or on either branch of the legislative department of the Government, but he would have become responsible to the people of this nation, and could only be removed in the mode pointed out by the Constitution and the law. What then would be the duty of the Senate? Being without a Presiding Officer, to elect its President pro tempore, who holds just as long as this body sees proper to continue him in office, and if the President pro tempore who has now succeeded to the office of President of the United States should die—a contingency not likely to happen, but which might happen nevertheless—where then would come, if there were no other provisions of law than these, the President of the United States? The President pro tempore would simply succeed to the position again; I mean in the absence of other legislation on the subject.

In Mississippi, I remember once, under a precisely similar clause in the constitution of that State, our governor, General Quitman, resigned the office of governor. Judge John I. Glihon, a very distinguished lawyer indeed, a man who had presided with great distinction as judge, being at that time president of the senate, at once made his obeisance to that body and assumed the discharge of the duties of governor of the State, and the senate immediately proceeded to elect its president pro tempore, who continued to preside for the residue of the term.

Recently in Mississippi, under the constitution of the State adopted since the reconstruction acts, it was provided that thirty days after the election of the governor and State officers under the new constitution, all the offices of the State should be vacated and that the governor should appoint, by and with the advice of the senate, the various officers provided by law. By and with the advice and consent of the senate, mark you, he was to appoint the various officers to discharge their duties in the State. There were some three thousand of these. The governor went forward to appoint, and he appointed, among others, members of the board of supervisors in a certain county. They were by the senate confirmed. The constitution provided that this class of officers should hold their offices until they should be filled by election. The governor undertook to remove a board of supervisors that he had appointed and that had been confirmed by the senate. This teaches now a branch of the subject that is under discussion here to-day. I desire to offer to the Senate an opinion of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi touching the power of the governor to remove an officer provided for in the constitution, and an officer that had been appointed by him and confirmed by the senate of the State—a strong case—no definite time being fixed when the terms of this class of officers should expire, but simply that they should expire at the will of the Legislature, when the Legislature should provide for an election. I will send the book to the Secretary and ask that he read what the supreme court of a State say upon that subject, and they take a rather comprehensive view, as the Senate will observe.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It is contended by counsel for appellees that the term of office for which the appellants, Newson, Mason, and Acree, were appointed was not fixed and definite, and, therefore, the power of removal was incident to that of appointment. It was once a vexed question whether the President of the United States had the right and power in any case to remove an incumbent from office, but it was well settled that, prior to the tenure of office act, where no tenure of office was prescribed by the Constitution or laws of the United States, it was held at the pleasure of the appointing power, and that the power of removal, in such cases, was incident to that of appointment; that the President, anterior to that act, possessed the power of removing all officers, civil and military, except those in the judicial department, or where Congress had given some other duration to their office. In the absence of all constitutional provision, or statutory regulation, it would seem to be a sound and necessary rule to regard the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment. This power of removal from office was a subject of much dispute, and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of the Federal Government. This, however, related to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate, and the great question was, whether the removal was to be by the President alone, or with the concurrence of the Senate—both constituting the appointing power. No one denied the power of the President and Senate jointly to remove where the tenure of office was not fixed by the Constitution or act of Congress. This was a full recognition of the principle that the power of removal was incident to the power of appointment in all such cases. But it was very early adopted as the practical construction of the Constitution that this power was vested in the President alone. And this doctrine has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of ex parte Hennen, 13 Peters, 225, and acquiesced in by every department of the Government from that time down to the administration of President Johnson, when the tenure of office act was passed by Congress. (44 Mississippi Reports, pages 360, 361.)

Mr. ALCORN. I have nothing further to say upon this point. It occurs to me that there can be no question but that the power to appoint includes the power to remove, there being no period fixed at which the occupant is to hold the office. The Senator from Ohio asked why the Constitution did not say "for the day," why it was not more definite? The framers of the Constitution at the time evidently had not the contingency of the death of the President of the United States in their minds. I might ask why did not the Constitution of the United States say that this President pro tempore should preside in the absence of the Vice-President of the United States; should discharge the duties in case of his absence? Why did not the Constitution go on and say "and in case he shall become President he shall continue to discharge the duties during the term for which the Vice-President was elected?" Why did not the Constitution say that? Simply because the framers of the Constitution did not desire to confer any such power, any such independent authority, upon a mere President pro tempore of this body. The framers of the Constitution gave authority to the Senate to appoint their own President pro tempore and the Constitution has authorized Congress to provide that in a certain contingency he may inherit—if I may be allowed the expression—the Presidency, or, in other words, that the duties of President may devolve upon him. That was doubtless meant to provide for the vacation of the Senate, when that body was not in its place, when the President might die at a time when there would be no one at the capital to take charge of and discharge the duties of the office of President. It was to avoid the possibility of an interregnum; it was to avoid the possibility of that confusion which would arise in case doubt were left upon that subject; and if that contingency should occur and the President pro tempore should go forward to discharge the duties devolved upon him under the law and the Constitution, who is it that would deny the authority of this body, coming together, to choose its presiding officer for the time being? What other officer could they choose except a President pro tempore?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The question is on the indefinite postponement of the third resolution.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOGY. Let it be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

3. Resolved, That the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is held at the pleasure of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the indefinite postponement of this resolution, on which the Senator from Indiana calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ENGLISH. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Merrimon, Randolph, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Key, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Burnside, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, English, Ferry, Gordon, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Maxey, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, and Sherman—18.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I voted for the indefinite postponement because I do not think any practical question is now pending before the Senate. I had intended to vote for the resolution of the committee, because, to a certain extent, I believe it enunciates the true principle in regard to the power of the Senate over the President pro tempore; and had it not been for the remarks which fell from the Senator from Vermont immediately opposite me [Mr. EDMUNDS] in regard to the extension of that power, I should still be willing to vote for the resolution as it came from the committee; but I desire to offer an amendment to make it clearer than it seems to me now to be, and if the amendment be adopted I shall then with pleasure vote for the resolution; if it be not, I shall vote against it. The amendment is to add to the resolution these words:

Until the happening of the contingency provided for in the ninth section of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1792, when he is authorized to act as President of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. I should have no objection to that amendment if it did not carry with it an implication that perhaps the Senator from Maryland does not intend. I think as it is now framed it would carry the implication that, after the contingency had happened, the President pro tempore could not then be changed by the Senate. That may be the law, but I am not prepared now to say that it is; and if my friend will just frame his proposition so as to state that it only applies until that time, leaving the question open after that time, I shall be willing to accept it so far as I am concerned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the effect of that would be to leave the original resolution in substance just as it stands now. The present resolution declares in general terms, without looking forward to a question which may arise, that this officer holds his office at the pleasure of the Senate. I think that is perfectly consistent with the idea that by a certain event he may cease to be an officer of the Senate and become something else, as some gentlemen maintain. This resolution stands just as well then; so that there is no occasion, in my opinion, for this addition proposed by the Senator from Maryland, because I do not think this resolution raises the question. If the argument in favor of the future is sound that has been advanced, (and whether it is sound or not it is not now necessary to go into a discussion of,) certainly we all ought to be able to agree. I think, now, as the Senator from Maryland I believe expresses his satisfaction with it, that, taking the resolution in its general and parliamentary sense, speaking not of future contingencies but of the daily exercise of our functions as a Senate, we can all affirm this resolution as it stands. I should hope, therefore, that the amendment would not be pressed.

Mr. WHYTE. I have but a word to say, and am very reluctant even to trespass on the time of the Senate to say that word. The very difficulty which we would all like to avoid, that is of any trouble arising after the contingency contemplated by the act of 1792 shall take place, will not be avoided by the expression of opinion limited as it is limited in the resolution of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I meant the very thing which the Senator from Indiana referred to. I meant to say if the Senate is to express an opinion—and I wish to concur in that opinion—that after the duties of President of the United States had devolved on the President pro tempore of the Senate we had no power or control over him then at all. The law passed in 1792, to which the Senate of that day gave its concurrence, divested us of power and control over him pending the period that he was exercising and discharging the functions of President of the United States. Therefore, unless the Senate means merely to limit its power over the President pro tempore until the period when by operation of law he assumes higher and more important functions than those of Senator, I shall certainly not vote for the resolution.

Mr. ALCORN. I shall not support the amendment, for the reason that it is a mere obiter dictum; and if we pass it here and the contemplated contingency should arise, while my mind is very clear to-day, still it might be that after having other lights on the subject and hearing from those who have studied the subject and when I have studied it more myself than I have done, I might change my opinion. I propose simply to go so far as it is necessary to go to-day; and when the further contingency arises, as we trust it never will arise, then we will discuss that question; and I have no doubt if the President pro tempore who is now enjoying the office should be then enjoying the office that he would be very patient in listening to it, and would not care very much how long the discussion should be prolonged.

Mr. MORTON. On a second reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland I am clear that it would carry with it the implication that after the contingency had happened the President pro tempore was no longer under the control of the Senate. That may be the law, but I am not prepared to say so by my vote at this time, and I think that amendment, read hereafter when the understanding that exists here to-day shall have passed away or be not fully recorded, will carry with it that implication. I do not understand the Senator from Maryland intends that, but simply intends to except the tenure of the office after that contingency from the effect of the resolution. If he would so frame it as to make it distinct on that point, I should have no objection; but I think the resolution as it stands now does not carry with it any force or implication which would be binding after the contingency had happened. I think it is merely a declaration that now the office of President pro tempore is held at the pleasure of the Senate, and what might be the tenure of the office after that contingency had happened I do not think is embraced in the present resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not think that it is necessary to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Maryland; nevertheless I shall vote for it, because I cannot see what possible harm it can do. I see very well that the Senator from Maryland has had this idea suggested to him from remarks thrown out in the debate. I do not concur in the view which has been expressed, that after the duties of the office of President of the United States have been devolved on the President pro tempore of the Senate the Senate has then any control whatever over him. I think that the moment the duties of the office of President of the United States are devolved on the President pro tempore, eo instanti he ceases to be a member of the Senate if he accepts the other office, and he is beyond the control or the reach of this body in any respect except through the constitutional mode of impeachment for the non-performance or for the manner in which he discharges his duties as President of the United States. I do not think, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is necessary, but I can see no harm to arise from it; and, as that amendment has been suggested by reason of remarks thrown out in debate, I shall concur in the amendment by my vote. I shall vote for the resolution, however, whether it is amended or not amended.

Mr. WRIGHT. I regret very much to have to ask once more that the resolution be reported with the amendment. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to a suggestion that I think there is in connection with his amendment, when it shall be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution and amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the original resolution as offered by the committee to assert that the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is held at the pleasure of the Senate. Now, the Senator from Maryland proposes to amend it by adding "until the contingency arises under the act of 1792." The inevitable implication from that in my mind is that he is still the President of the Senate pro tempore after this contingency arises. Now, the Senator certainly does not wish to raise that implication nor to so state. The original resolution, in other words, says that the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is at the pleasure of the Senate. He says "until a certain contingency arises." Then it is not at the pleasure of the Senate, but he is still the President pro tempore of the Senate according to the amendment. I am sure the Senator from Maryland does not intend to assert that, nor does he want to have it understood that he means that. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment is vicious. First, because, as the Senator from Indiana says, it is subject to the implication that he states, and I think it is subject to the implication that I have stated. In view of what it seems to me must be the clear sentiment of the Senate on this subject and must be the clear law, I suggest that it is better to withdraw the amendment and let us take the question simply on the resolution as offered by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am very forcibly impressed by what has just been said by the Senator from Iowa, that, in view of the imperfection of human language, we ought to try to express our ideas so that there shall be no ambiguity. His argument is, that if we adopt the amendment there will be an implication that after the Presidency devolves on the President pro tempore of the Senate the power to change him shall cease; which would be an implication that he continued to be a member of this body. I think he would cease to be a member of this body; and while I quite concur with the Senator from Maryland that when the Presidency devolves upon him he cannot be ousted of that by any action of the Senate whatsoever unless he were impeached. I am a little afraid that the amendment does carry the implication that he continues to be a member of this body after the Presidency has devolved upon him.

Mr. STEVENSON. The great desire I have is that we should arrive at something fixed and definite, so that everybody may understand what the real character of the appointee is. I will take this case: suppose the President of the United States were to die to-night; I take it that the distinguished Presiding Officer of the Senate would be President; but suppose he were to die, then would the temporary President of the Senate or would the Speaker of the House be the President of the United States? If Senator FERRY were to become to-morrow the President of the United States, and a week after that were to die, what would be the consequence? The law says that if there be no President pro tempore of the Senate the Speaker of the House shall succeed; but we in the mean time would have selected another President pro tempore. Can any Senator say at once what the construction would be, whether the President pro tempore who took Senator FERRY'S place would be, in the event of his death, the President, or would the Speaker of the House be? These are matters too important, it seems to me, to go unsettled. I have no feeling on the subject whatever, except that we shall take such action as to provide for every contingency that may occur, so that the Senate itself, when it elects a President pro tempore, shall know by the law as fixed what his responsibilities are, and, in the event of his death, who will succeed him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it is perfectly impossible for the Senate to settle the question that the Senator from Kentucky speaks of except by participating in the passage of a law. We can settle who our presiding officer is to be, and how long he shall be presiding officer, because the Constitution gives us that power; but when it comes to duties that are imposed upon him or upon anybody else by law, if the law is constitutional at all, we as a Senate cannot determine who, or how, or in what way he shall exercise those duties that the law speaks of. Now, this resolution of the Senator from Indiana is directed to our privileges as an independent body acting for ourselves. Beyond that we cannot express any opinion that is of any value except as evincing the view of the individuals who express it, and that is one reason why I am opposed to this amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I agree to what the honrable Senator says, but I propose, when this subject is disposed of, to offer a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to look into this matter, and by necessary and proper legislation to provide for every emergency which may occur. I think it is exceedingly uncertain now, and I think that the most honest minds, the ablest legal minds, may well differ as to what construction should be put upon it. I do not think we ought to leave the matter unsettled. Though it is not determined by the pending resolution, yet the Judiciary Committee, it seems to me, might by proper legislation provide for every contingency, so as to leave no hiatus in the event of the death of any of these high functionaries.

Mr. THURMAN. When the Senator from Vermont said that the third resolution now under consideration merely called upon us to exercise our independent power as a Senate in a matter with which no other body has anything to do, it is a begging of the question; for if the Constitution is correctly interpreted by the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Florida, then it is a question what the Constitution means, and upon that the other House has as much right to decide as the Senate. We are not clothed with any exclusive jurisdiction over the subject if, as those Senators think, the Constitution fixes the term of the office of our Presiding Officer.

But you see, Mr. President, that we are getting into a great deal of constitution-making or constitution-expounding here, and deciding a question that has not yet arisen in the Senate. If we are to expound the Constitution, to give the weight of the opinion of the Senate to any particular interpretation of the Constitution, it ought to be had with very great deliberation; and although I do not wish to prolong this discussion and have nothing more to say, as far as I know, I should like to consider this amendmtnt which has been offered by the Senator from Maryland, and in order to have time to do so I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. No! No!

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I agree fully with the report of the committee as far as this resolution is concerned. I think it is correct as it stands. At the same time, as to the question of the power of the Senate to elect a President pro tempore in the contingency of the death of the President of the United States after the duties of President are cast on that President pro tempore, I agree fully with the Senator from Ohio. But agreeing with him in that proposition, and that the office of President pro tempore becomes vacant, and that the senatorial office of the President pro tempore becomes vacant, I can still vote for this resolution, because with that idea when he succeeds to the duties of the Presidency there is a vacancy and we may still go on and elect a President pro tempore, so that the resolution as it now stands is correct in either view upon that point.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I understand the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, if it shall be passed, will express the opinion of the Senate upon the facts as they now exist, nothing further; and, entertaining those views, I vote upon the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ENGLISH, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] on all propositions connected with this subject.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kernan, McCreery, Merrimon, Randolph, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Key, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Wadleigh, West, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Burnside, Dennis, Dorsey, English, Ferry, Gordon, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, Maxey, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, and Windom—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCDONALD, (when Mr. BURNSIDE'S name was called.) The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] He would vote in the affirmative and I in the negative, if he were here.

Mr. KELLY, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] If he were present he would vote for the resolution and I should vote against it.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 34, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Kernan, Key, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Johnston, McCreery, Merrimon, Randolph, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cockrell, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, English, Ferry, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, Maxey, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, and Sherman,—23.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

4. Resolved, That Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY, a Senator from Michigan, who was elected President pro tempore of the Senate at the last session, is now the President pro tempore by virtue of said election.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he withdraw that resolution, inasmuch as in view of what we have declared the resolution as it is drawn is inconsistent with that declaration, as since his election at the last session he has been again appointed under an order of the Senate to hold until a fresh appointment should be made; and as this resolution states that his present title is on the old election and not on the new one, it seems to me to be inconsistent with the declaration we have made. Therefore I suggest that it is entirely unnecessary and had better be withdrawn.

Mr. MORTON. We have declared that Mr. FERRY continued to act by virtue of his election before the end of the last session. I suppose that the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont reaches this point, that although he was the legal President pro tempore when the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont passed, yet technically his present term dates from that resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly.

Mr. MORTON. That I understand to be the Senator's point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If he were commissioned as another officer would be, his commission would be under his present election at this session.

Mr. MORTON. I understand the Senator's point to go to this, that although he was at the time the President pro tempore holding legally, the same man being again re-elected his present term dates from that last election.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, the office being held at our pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. It occurs to me that the Senator from Vermont is technically right. I know the resolution offered by him was simply intended to cover a doubt. It was not intended to affect the office.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Would it make any difference by what election he held? If this resolution is passed it declares the fact that the President pro tempore is such.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It declares that he holds under the old title, which is entirely inconsistent with the resolution we have just adopted that he holds at our pleasure.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does it so declare?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; it says that by virtue of the old election he now holds, when holding by our pleasure he holds by virtue of the new election.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to hear the resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again report the resolution.

The resolution was read.

Mr. MORTON. I think that the resolution technically is not correct. I think that technically he holds from the election the other day and not from the election of last session, and, entertaining that view, I withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The SPEAKER. What reference does the gentleman propose to give the bill?

Mr. WHITE. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask whether the bill presented by the gentleman from Kentucky, and which he asks be referred to the Committee on Commerce, should not under the rules be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals? I think under the ninety-fourth rule it should be so referred.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair it has been the custom of the House to refer all such bills to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Will the Speaker let the ninety-fourth rule be read by the Clerk?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

The Clerk read as follows:

94. It shall be the duty of the Committee on Roads and Canals to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things relating to roads and canals, and the improvement of the navigation of rivers, as shall be presented, or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report thereupon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. As I understand, this bill relates to the improvement of a river, and under that rule should be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now direct the Clerk to read the rule relating to the Committee on Commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

79. It shall be the duty of the Committee on Commerce to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching the commerce of the United States as shall be presented, or shall or may come into question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their opinion thereon.

The SPEAKER. The uniform ruling of the Chair heretofore has been that bills of this kind, relating to the water communication of the country, should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Does this bill refer to the commerce of the United States or to navigation within the lines of the States?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot make such a distinction.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The ninety-fourth rule provides expressly that all bills for the improvement of rivers shall go to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. HEREFORD. But the uniform practice in this House heretofore has been the reverse.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Then the universal practice has been in violation of a rule of this House. I do not particularly desire that these bills shall be referred to the committee of which I am chairman, but I do desire this rule and every other rule of this House shall be obeyed strictly. I ask the ruling of the Chair on my point.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair this bill should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I dislike to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair; and I now give notice that I shall offer a resolution, when in order, to refer all these bills to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

REMOVAL OF DISTINCTION IN SALARIES.

The SPEAKER. To what committee does the gentleman wish the bill to go?

Mr. WHITE. To the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair this should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, within whose jurisdiction it is to fix these salaries. Does the gentleman insist on reference to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. WHITE. I do not.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMNESTY.

The SPEAKER. The business now in order is the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amnesty bill was rejected, and upon that question the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If the gentleman from Ohio will yield to me for a minute, I desire to make an inquiry with reference to the continuance of this debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. We have now introduced into this House and appropriately referred more than one thousand bills; we have passed almost none. Twenty-three gentlemen have indicated at the Speaker's desk their desire to speak upon this question. I submit whether it will not be desirable, in the interest of the country, to terminate this debate at the earliest practicable period, so that we can proceed to the necessary legislation now laid out and before us. My object is to inquire, before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] proceeds, whether there is any understanding or arrangement or conclusion reached by the gentlemen who have charge of this measure as to the time when this debate shall terminate.

Mr. RANDALL. It is my intention, at an appropriate time this morning, to call the previous question upon the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] I propose to do it one hour after the gentleman from Ohio shall have concluded what he may have to say, for the reason that the time may equitably be divided between the friends and the opponents of the proposition.

Mr. BLAINE. By what right, under the rules, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] observing the courtesies of debate, announce that he will call the previous question on my motion?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not mean to violate in any particular the courtesies of debate. I claim the right, just as the gentleman did, he being of the prevailing side, to move a reconsideration. The gentleman will observe that the motion for the previous question is a majority motion, which I have the right to make.

Mr. BLAINE. Why?

Mr. RANDALL. Because otherwise the minority side of this House might continue the debate without limit, contrary to the wish of the majority, of which I am one.

Mr. BLAINE. That is no reason at all. That might be done by other gentlemen. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he will call the previous question one hour after the gentleman from Ohio shall have concluded? What does he propose to do with that hour?

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to give any portion of that hour I can to you, so much as you wish.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire more especial attention to this point.

Mr. RANDALL. If I cannot secure to that side any portion of that hour, then I will postpone calling the previous question until such time as will allow the gentleman from Maine to make any reply he may see fit.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, then, that I am to be indebted to his courtesy for that hour?

Mr. RANDALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask your ruling. Rule 63 of this House says:

No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House—April 7, 1789—unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending; in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.—January 14, 1840.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] introduced the amnesty bill and brought the House to a vote upon it. It was utterly defeated; it was dead; he had lost all control of it. I was "the mover, the proposer, the introducer" of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, and the gentleman had his hour.

Mr. BLAINE. I have the right to reply.

Mr. RANDALL. That I propose to give you.

Mr. BLAINE. You propose to give it to me by your courtesy. I propose to have it under the rule of the House or not at all.

Mr. RANDALL. That is for the Speaker to determine.

Mr. BLAINE. I want the Speaker to rule on that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule on the point when it arises.

Mr. BLAINE. It arises upon the notice given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to call attention to a portion of the rules in regard to the point made by the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. That question is not now before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, no gentleman on this floor can regret more sincerely than I do the course that the debate has taken, especially that portion which occurred yesterday. To one who reads the report of that discussion it would be difficult to discover the real question at issue and to learn from the RECORD itself the scope and character of the pending measure. I regret that neither the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] nor that of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] has yet appeared in the RECORD. I should prefer to quote from the full report, but, replying now, I must quote them as their speeches appeared in the public journals of yesterday and to-day. But they are here, and can correct any inaccuracy of quotation. Any one who reads their speeches would not suspect that they were debating a simple proposition to relieve some citizens of political and legal disabilities incurred during the late war. For example, had I been a casual reader and not a listener, I should say that the chief proposition yesterday was an arraignment of the administration of this Government during the last fifteen years. If I had been called upon to pick out those declarations in the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] which embody the topic of debate, I should have said they were these:

The history of the last fifteen years is yet fresh in the minds of the world. It is useless to speak of the grace and magnanimity of the republican party. With the master enslaved, with intelligence disfranchised, with society disordered, with States subverted, with Legislatures dispersed, people cannot afford to talk of grace and magnanimity. If that is grace and magnanimity, I pray God to spare the country in the future from such virtues.

I should say that the propositions and arguments arrayed around that paragraph were the center and circumference of his theme. Let me then in a few words try to recall the House to the actual topic of this debate.

A gentleman on the other side of the House, a few days ago, introduced a proposition in the form of a bill to grant amnesty to the remaining persons who are not yet relieved of their political disabilities under the Constitution. That is a plain proposition for practical legislation. It is a very important proposition. It is a proposition to finish and complete forever the work of executing one of the great clauses of the Constitution of our country. When that bill shall have become a law, a large portion of the fourteenth amendment will have ceased to be an operative clause of the Constitution.

Whenever so great and important a matter is proposed a deliberative body should bring to its consideration the fullest and most serious examination. But what was proposed in this case? Not to deliberate, not to amend, not even to refer to a committee for the ordinary consideration given even to a proposition to repeal the tax on matches. No reference to anybody; but a member of the House, of his own motion and at his own discretion, proposes to launch that proposition into the House, refusing the privilege of amendment and the right to debate, except as it might come from his courtesy, and pass it, declaring, as he does so, the time has come to do justice to an oppressed people.

Under circumstances like these, Mr. Speaker, a large number of gentlemen on this floor felt that they had a right, under the rules of the House and in the forum of justice and fair dealing, an undoubted right to deliberate on the proposition; that it should be open for amendment and debate. Every expression on this side of the House showed that we were earnestly in favor of so closing this last act in the drama of war so far as it relates to disabilities; that it should be closed forever—closed in good faith and with good feeling. We deeply regretted that the attempt was made to cut us off from deliberation and amendment, and we therefore threw ourselves back upon our rights; and it is by virtue of those rights that we debate this question to-day.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] offered a criticism on the bill. He suggested that there were two points in which the bill ought to be changed. One was that the seven hundred and fifty persons who are still forbidden to hold office under the Constitution should have free and absolute amnesty whenever they declare, by taking the oath of allegiance in open court, that they want it; that, like God's mercy and perfect pardon, amnesty should be granted by asking for it. It was suggested that we should follow the rule that we have followed hitherto in all cases similarly situated. That was the first point.

Another point suggested was, that there is one person, and only one, who ought to be excepted from the operation of the proposed law. Now that may have been wise or it may have been unwise, as a matter of statesmanship, but it was a question deserving debate, deliberation, and answer.

The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is an affirmative one, and should be supported by affirmative reasons. If we allege any reason against it, we ought to be answered. Two allegations have been made: first, that there ought to be an oath of allegiance before a court; and, second, that one man ought to be excepted. How have these propositions been met? How have these suggestions been answered? The first response was a speech full of brilliant wit and personalities. It was like joking at a funeral to joke on such an occasion. They have been answered, in the second place, by the speech of yesterday, who arraigns not the republican party alone, but arraigns twenty-five million of people, arraigns the history of the Republic for fifteen years, arraigns everything that is glorious in its record and high and worthy in its achievement. I was deeply pained that such an arraignment should have been made on such a subject. If the gentleman had confined himself to a reply to the argument which had been offered to show why the exception should be made, it would have been a response pertinent to the subject-matter in controversy.

While I occupy the attention of the House, I shall endeavor to confine myself to the question and to the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Let me say in the outset that, so far as I am personally concerned, I have never voted against any proposition to grant amnesty to any human being who has asked for it at the bar of the House. Furthermore, I appeal to gentlemen on the other side who have been with me in this Hall many years, whether at any time they have found me truculent in spirit, unkind in tone or feeling toward those who fought against us in the late war. Twelve years ago this very month, standing in this place, I said this: "I believe a truce could be struck to-day between the rank and file of the hostile armies now in the field. I believe they could meet and shake hands together, joyful over returning peace, each respecting the courage and manhood of the other and each better able to live in amity than before the war."

I am glad to repeat word for word what I said that day. For the purposes of this speech I will not even claim the whole ground which the Government assumed toward the late rebellion. For the sake of the present argument I will view the position of those who took up arms against the Government in the light least offensive to them. Leaving out of sight for the moment the question of slavery, which evoked so much passion, and which was the producing cause of the late war, there were still two opposing political theories which met in conflict. Most of the southern statesmen believed that their first obedience was due to their State. We believed that the allegiance of an American citizen was due to the National Government, not by the way of a State capital, but in a direct line from his own heart to the Government of the Union. Now, that question was submitted to the dreadful arbitrament of war, to the court of last resort—a court from which there is no appeal, and to which all other powers must bow. To that dread court the great question was carried, and there the right of a State to secede was put to rest forever. For the sake of peace and union, I am willing to treat our late antagonists as I would treat litigants in other courts, who, when they have made their appeal and the final judgment is rendered, pay the reasonable costs and bow to its mandates. But our question to-day is not that, but is closely connected with it. When we have made our argument and the court has rendered its judgment, it may be that in the course of its proceedings the court has used its discretion to disbar some of its counsellors for malpractice, for unprofessional conduct. In such a case a motion may be made to restore the disbarred members. Applying this illustration to the present case, there are seven hundred and fifty people who are yet disbarred before the highest authority of the Republic—the Constitution itself. The proposition is to offer again the privileges of official station to these people; and we are all agreed as to every human being of them save one.

I do not object to Jefferson Davis because he was a conspicuous leader. Whatever we may believe theologically, I do not believe in the doctrine of vicarious atonement in politics. Jefferson Davis was no more guilty for taking up arms than any other man who went into the rebellion with equal intelligence. But this is the question: In the high court of war did he practice according to its well-known laws—the laws of nations? Did he, in appealing to war, obey the laws of war, or did he so violate those laws that justice to those who suffered at his hands demands that he be not permitted to come back to his old privileges in the Union? That is the whole question; and it is as plain and fair a question for deliberation as was ever debated in this House.

Now, I wish we could discuss it without any passion—without passionate thoughts, such as we heard yesterday. The words were eloquent, for the gentleman from Georgia well knows how to utter passionate thoughts with all the grace and eloquence of speech.

What answer has been made to the allegations of the gentleman from Maine to the reasons he offered why a full amnesty should not be offered to Jefferson Davis? The gentleman from Georgia denies, and so also apparently did the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] the authenticity of the charges of atrocities at Andersonville.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] spoke of the committee from whose report the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] read as a "humbug committee." The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] spoke of it as an ex parte and partisan committee—a committee that wrote and reported out of its fury and rage. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling that this case shall turn upon the mere authority of a committee, however high; but I want to say now, without arguing the merits, that whether the charge was just or unjust, it was a charge made by the Government of the United States. I mean to place the responsibility of the charges on the high ground of the authority of the Government, which no self-respecting man can call trivial and unworthy of his serious attention.

On the 4th day of May, 1864, the Secretary of War, speaking by the authority of the executive department of the National Government, addressed a communication to a committee of Congress, which I will read. It is found in a volume of reports of committees of the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress, volume 1, 1863-'64, and is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, May 4, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you a report made to this Department by Colonel Hoffman, commissary general of prisoners, in regard to the condition of Union soldiers who have until within a few days been prisoners of war at Richmond, and would respectfully request that your committee immediately proceed to Annapolis to take testimony there and examine with their own eyes the condition of those who have been returned from rebel captivity. The enormity of the crime committed by the rebels toward our prisoners for the last several months is not known or realized by our people, and cannot but fill with horror the civilized world when the facts are fully revealed. There appears to have been a deliberate system of savage and barbarous treatment and starvation, the result of which will be that few, if any, of the prisoners that have been in their hands during the past winter will ever again be in a condition to render any service or even to enjoy life.

Your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. B. F. WADE,
Chairman of Joint Committee on Conduct of the War.

On the receipt of this letter a joint committee of the two Houses, known as the Committee on the Conduct of the War, was sent to Annapolis, to hold their sessions in the presence of the thousands of returned prisoners who had just been landed, and as the result of their deliberations and after taking testimony on the spot from officers and men who had just returned, they reported not only their opinions but the testimony in full in the volume which I hold in my hand. That committee was composed of republicans and democrats, and its report is unanimous. The democrats on the committee were among the foremost members of the Senate and House. One of them was Mr. Odell, of New York, a gentleman not now living, who was one of the best men that party has had on the floor of this House since I have been a member. Another was Senator Harding, of Oregon. That committee made an elaborate report, from which I will read a few paragraphs.

The evidence proves beyond all manner of doubt a determination on the part of the rebel authorities, deliberately and persistently practiced for a long time past, to subject those of our soldiers who have been so unfortunate as to fall in their hands to a system of treatment which has resulted in reducing many of those who have survived and been permitted to return to us to a condition, both physically and mentally, which no language we can use can adequately describe. Though nearly all the patients now in the Naval Academy hospital at Annapolis and in the West hospital in Baltimore have been under the kindest and most intelligent treatment for about three weeks past, and many of them for a greater length of time, still they present literally the appearance of living skeletons, many of them being nothing but skin and bone; some of them are maimed for life, having been frozen while exposed to the inclemency of the winter season on Belle Isle, being compelled to lie on the bare ground without tents or blankets, some of them without overcoats or even coats, with but little fire to mitigate the severity of the winds and storms to which they were exposed. * * * *

It will be observed from the testimony that all the witnesses who testify upon that point state that the treatment they received while confined at Columbia, South Carolina, Dalton, Georgia, and other places, was far more humane than that they received at Richmond, where the authorities of the so-called confederacy were congregated, and where the power existed, had the inclination not been wanting, to reform those abuses and secure to the prisoners they held some treatment that would bear a public comparison to that accorded by our authorities to the prisoners in our custody. Your committee, therefore, are constrained to say that they can hardly avoid the conclusion expressed by so many of our released soldiers, that the inhuman practices herein referred to are the result of a determination on the part of the rebel authorities to reduce our soldiers in their power by privation of food and clothing and by exposure to such a condition that those who may survive shall never recover so as to be able to render any effective service in the field.

I am not now discussing the merits of the charge at all, but am showing that such is, and for twelve years has continued to be, the authoritative official charge of the executive department of the Government and of a joint committee of the two Houses. So much for the responsible character of the charge. To this I should add that this charge is believed to be true by a great majority of the people whom we represent on this floor.

I now inquire is this charge true?

The gentleman from Georgia denies generally the charge that atrocities were practiced upon our prisoners at Andersonville. He makes a general denial, and asserts that Mr. Davis did observe the humane rules of modern warfare. As a proof he quotes the general order issued by the president of the confederate government under which the prison was to be established, an order providing that it should be located on healthy ground, where there was an abundance of good water, and trees for healthful and grateful shade. That is a perfect answer so far as it goes. But I ask how that order was executed? To whose hands was committed the work of building the Andersonville prison? To the hands of General Winder, an intimate and favorite friend of Mr. Davis. And who was General Winder? He was a man of whom the Richmond Examiner used these words the day he took his departure from Richmond to assume command of the proposed prison:

Thank God that Richmond is at last rid of old Winder. God have mercy upon those to whom he has been sent!

He was, as the testimony in the Wirz trial shows, the special and intimate friend of Jefferson Davis, and by the president of the confederacy he was detailed on this business, and detailed with such a send-off as I have read you from a paper of his own city warmly in the interest of the rebel cause.

What next? How did General Winder execute the order after he went there? I turn to the Wirz trial, and read from it only such authorities as the gentleman from Georgia recognizes—officers of the rebel army. The gentleman stated yesterday that there was nothing in this book connecting the head of the confederate government with the Andersonville atrocities. Before I am through we will see. On the 5th day of January, 1864, a report was made by D. T. Chandler, a lieutenant-colonel of the confederate army. This report was offered in evidence in the Wirz trial, and Colonel Chandler was himself a witness at that trial, and swears that the report is genuine. I quote from page 224:

ANDERSON, January 5, 1864.

COLONEL: Having, in obedience to instructions of the 25th ultimo, carefully inspected the prison for Federal prisoners of war and post at this place, I respectfully submit the following report:

The Federal prisoners of war are confined within a stockade fifteen feet high, of roughly hewn pine logs about eight inches in diameter, inserted five feet into the ground, inclosing, including the recent extension, an area of five hundred and forty by two hundred and sixty yards. A railing around the inside of the stockade, and about twenty feet from it, constitutes the "dead line," beyond which the prisoners are not allowed to pass, and about three and one-fourth acres near the center of the inclosure are so marshy as to be at present unfit for occupation, reducing the available present area to about twenty-three and one-half acres, which gives somewhat less than six square feet to each prisoner. Even this is being constantly reduced by the additions to their number. A small stream passing from west to east through the inclosure, at about one hundred and fifty yards from its southern limit, furnishes the only water for washing accessible to the prisoners. Some regimen of the guard, the bakery, and the cook-house, being placed on the rising grounds bordering the stream before it enters the prison, renders the water nearly unfit for use before it reaches the prisoners. * * *

Assistant Adjutant and Inspector-General.

Colonel R. H. CHILTON,
Assistant Adjutant and Inspector-General.

Here is an official exhibit of the manner in which the officer detailed by Jeff. Davis chose the place for health, and running water, and agreeable shade. He chose a piece of forest-ground that had a miasmatic marsh in the heart of it and a small stream running through it; but the troops stationed outside of the stockade were allowed to defile its pure water before it could reach the stockade, and then, as if in the very refinement of cruelty, as if to make a mockery of the order quoted by the gentleman from Georgia, he detailed men to cut down every tree and shrub in the inclosure, leaving not a green leaf to show where the forest had been. And subsequently, when the burning sun of July was pouring down its fiery heat upon the heads of these men, with but six square feet of ground to a man, a piteous petition was made by the prisoners to Winder to allow these poor men to be detailed to go outside under guard and cut pine from the forest to make arbors under which they could shelter themselves, and they were answered with all the loathsome brutality of malignant hate, that they should have no bush to shelter them; and thus, under the fierce rays of the southern sun, they miserably perished.

These last statements are made on the authority of Ambrose Spencer, a planter of Georgia, who resided within five miles of Andersonville. I quote from his testimony, (Wirz's trial, p. 359:)

Between the 1st and 15th of December, 1863, I went up to Andersonville with W. S. Winder and four or five other gentlemen, out of curiosity, to see how the prison was to be laid out. * * * I asked him if he was going to erect barracks or shelter of any kind. He replied that he was not; that the damned Yankees who would be put in there would have no need of them. I asked him why he was cutting down all the trees, and suggested that they would prove a shelter to the prisoners, from the heat of the sun, at least. He made this reply, or something similar to it: "That is just what I am going to do; I am going to build a pen here that will kill more damned Yankees than can be destroyed in the front." Those are very nearly his words, or equivalent to them.

So much for the execution of the president's order to locate the prison.

But I am not yet done with the testimony of Colonel Chandler. A subsequent report was made by him in the month of August. He went back and re-examined the horrors of that pen, and as the result of his examination he made a report, from which I quote the last few sentences, (Wirz's trial, p. 227:)

ANDERSONVILLE, August 5, 1864.

COLONEL: * * *

My duty requires me respectfully to recommend a change in the officer in the command of the post, Brigadier-General J. H. Winder, and the substitution in his place of some one who unites both energy and good judgment with some feeling of humanity and consideration for the welfare and comfort (so far as is consistent with their safe-keeping) of the vast number of unfortunates placed under his control; some one who at least will not advocate deliberately and in cold blood the propriety of leaving them in their present condition until their number has been sufficiently reduced by death to make the present arrangement suffice for their accommodation; who will not consider it a matter of self-laudation and boasting that he has never been inside of the stockade, a place the horrors of which it is difficult to describe and which is a disgrace to civilization, the condition of which he might, by the exercise of a little energy and judgment, even with the limited means at his command, have considerably improved.

D. T. CHANDLER,
Assistant Adjutant and Inspector-General.

Colonel R. H. CHILTON,
Assistant Adjutant and Inspector-General C. S. A., Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. HALE. What is the date of that report?

Mr. GARFIELD. August 5, 1864.

Mr. HALE. How long after that was Winder retained there in command?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will come to that in a moment.

Now, what do honorable gentlemen suppose would naturally be done with such a report as that? Remember that Colonel Chandler was a witness before the court that tried Wirz and re-affirmed every word of this report. If he is living I would make a pilgrimage to see him and thank him for the humanity and tenderness with which he treated my unfortunate comrades. So anxious was he that the great crime of Winder should be rebuked that he went to Richmond, and in person delivered his report to the secretary of war, a member, of course, of the cabinet of Jefferson Davis. If I am not correct in this I believe there is a member of that cabinet now on this floor who can correct me. Of course, being a soldier, Colonel Chandler first delivered his report to the adjutant-general, and that officer, General Cooper, on the 18th of August, 1864, wrote upon the back of the report these words:

ADJUTANT AND INSPECTOR-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
August 18, 1864.

Respectfully submitted to the secretary of war. The condition of the prison at Andersonville is a reproach to us as a nation. The engineer and ordnance departments were applied to, and authorized their issue, and I so telegraphed General Winder. Colonel Chandler's recommendations are coincided in.

By order of General Cooper.

R. H. CHILTON,
Assistant Adjutant and Inspector-General.

Not content with that indorsement, Colonel Chandler went to the office of the secretary of war himself; but, the secretary being absent at the moment, the report was delivered to the assistant secretary of war, J. A. Campbell, who wrote below General Cooper's indorsement these words:

These reports show a condition of things at Andersonville which calls very loudly for the interposition of the department, in order that a change be made.

J. A. CAMPBELL,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. REAGAN. Does not the gentleman know that the adjutant-general could only have made such an order by direction of the president?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know what the habit was in the confederacy. It is not so in this Government.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will allow me to say that all persons familiar with the business of that office know that the adjutant-general executes direct orders made by the president, but has not himself authority to make such orders.

Mr. GARFIELD. That may have been the rule in the confederate government, but it was never the rule here. The Adjutant-General of our Army signs no order except by order of the Secretary of War. The Adjutant-General is the clerk of the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War is in turn the clerk of the President. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will soon see that he cannot defend Davis by the indorsement of General Cooper. The report did not stop with the adjutant-general. It was carried up higher and nearer to Davis. It was delivered to Assistant Secretary Campbell, and he wrote the indorsement I have just read. The report was lodged with the department of war, whose chief was one of the confidential advisers of Mr. Davis—a member of his official family. What was done with it? The record shows, Mr. Speaker, that a few days thereafter an order was made in reference to General Winder. To what effect? Promoting him! Adding to his power in the field of his infamy! He was made commissary-general of all the prisons and prisoners throughout the confederacy. That was the answer that came as the result of this humane report of Colonel Chandler; and that new appointment of Winder came from Mr. Seddons, the confederate secretary of war.

A MEMBER. By order of the President.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course all appointments were by the President, for the gentleman from Georgia says that they carried our Constitution with them and hugged it to their bosoms. But that is not all. The testimony of the Wirz trial shows that at one time the secretary of war himself became shocked at the brutality of Winder, and in a moment of indignation he relieved him from command. For authority upon this subject I refer to the testimony of Cashmyer, a detective of Winder's, who was called before the Wirz court. That officer testified that when Mr. Seddon, secretary of war, wrote the order relieving Winder, the latter walked over with it to Jefferson Davis, who immediately wrote on the back of it, "This is entirely unnecessary and uncalled for." Winder appears to have retained the confidence and approval of Davis to the end, and continued on duty until the merciful providence of God struck him dead in his tent in the presence of the witness who gave this testimony.

Now, who will deny that in the forum of law we do trace the responsibility for these atrocities to the man whose name is before us to be relieved of all his political disabilities? If not, let gentlemen show it. Wipe out the charge, and I will be the first man here to vote to relieve him of his disabilities.

Winder was allowed to go on. What did he do? I will only give results, not details. I will not harrow my own soul by the revival of those horrible details. There is a group of facts in military history well worth knowing which will illustrate the point I am discussing. The great Napoleon did some fighting in his time, as did his great antagonist the Iron Duke. In 1809 was fought the battle of Talavera, in 1811 the battle of Albuera, in 1812 the battle of Salamanca, in 1813 Vittoria, in 1815 the battles of Ligny, Quatre Bras, Waterloo, Wavre, and New Orleans, and in 1854 the battles of the Crimea. The number of men in the English army who fell in battle or who were killed or died of wounds received in all these battles amounted in the aggregate to 12,928. But this Major-General Winder, within his horrible arena of death, from April, 1864, to April, 1865, tumbled into the trenches of Andersonville the dead bodies of 12,644 prisoners—only two hundred and eighty-four less than all the Englishmen who fell in or died of wounds received in the great battles I have named.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have simply given these results. Percentages pale and fade away in the presence of such horrible facts.

And the gentleman from Georgia denies the charge of atrocities at Andersonville and charges us with greater ones. I will give his words as they are quoted in the morning papers:

> When the gentleman from Maine speaks again let him add that the atrocities of Andersonville do not begin to compare with the atrocities of Elmira, of Fort Douglas, or of Fort Delaware, and of all the atrocities, both at Andersonville and Elmira, the confederate government stands acquitted from all responsibility and blame.

I stand in the presence of that statement with an amazement that I am utterly incapable of expressing. I look upon the serene and manly face of the gentleman who uttered it, and I wonder what influence of the supernal or nether gods could have touched him with madness for the moment and led him to make that dreadful statement. I pause, and I ask the three democrats on this floor who happen to represent the districts where are located the three places named if there be one of them who does not know that this charge is fearfully and awfully untrue? [A pause.] Their silence answers me. They are strangers to me, but I know they will repel the charge with all the energy of their manhood.

Mr. PLATT. I hold in my hand a telegraphic communication from General B. F. Tracy, late commandant of the military post of Elmira, and I beg permission to read that communication.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. PLATT. The communication is as follows:

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK, January 12, 1876.

To Hon. T. C. PLATT,
House of Representatives, Washington, District of Columbia:

The facts justify your denial of cruelty, inhumanity, or neglect in the treatment of prisoners at Elmira. There was no suffering there which is not inseparable from a military prison. First, there was no dead-line. No prisoner was ever shot for attempting to escape. Second, the food was ample and of the best quality. Thousands of dollars were expended in the purchase of vegetables, in addition to the Army ration. No congressman in Washington eats better bread than was given daily to the prisoners. The beef was good, and of the same quality and quantity as that distributed to our own soldiers guarding the camp. Third, the dead were not buried in trenches, but the remains were placed in neat coffins and buried in separate graves, with a head-board bearing the name, company, and regiment, and time of death, and all were buried in the public cemetery at Elmira. Fourth, there was no better supplied military hospital in the United States than the hospital in the prison camp. Fifth, all the prisoners were comfortably quartered in new wooden barracks, built expressly for them. From the time I took command, in September, all the saw-mills in the vicinity of Elmira were kept constantly running to supply lumber for buildings, &c. The barracks for prisoners were first built, and in the extreme cold weather of winter the prisoners were all in barracks, while the soldiers guarding them were still in tents. I was criticised for this in the Army and Navy Journal, I think it was, at the time, by an officer of our Army. Sixth, the camp and all the buildings were well policed, and kept scrupulously clean. Seventh, the mortality which prevailed was not owing to neglect or want of sufficient supplies or medical attention, but to other and quite different causes.

B. F. TRACY,
Late Commandant Military Post Union.

Mr. WALKER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, as the member from the district in which Elmira Depot is located, I take pleasure in indorsing every word of Colonel Tracy's dispatch. I was almost daily at Elmira during the war, and I know that confederate prisoners had the same care and treatment that the Union soldiers had, and I never heard a complaint. [Great applause.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the lightning is our witness. From all quarters of the Republic denials are pouring in upon us. Since I came to the House this morning I have received the following dispatch from an honored soldier of Ohio, which tells its own story:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 12, 1876—10.33 a. m.

To GENERAL GARFIELD, House of Representatives:

By authority of Secretary of War I furnished 15,000 rebel prisoners at Elmira with the same rations—coffee, tobacco, coal, wood, clothing, barracks, medical attendance—as were given to our own soldiers. The dead were decently buried in Elmira cemetery. All this can be proved by democrats of that city.

General J. J. ELWELL.

Mr. HILL. By permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to say that there was no purpose on my part by any of my remarks on yesterday to charge inhumanity upon anybody at Elmira or anywhere else. I only read the evidence from official sources as I understood it.

Mr. BLAINE. A letter in a newspaper.

Mr. HILL. Let me get through, if you please. Do not be uneasy. Keep quiet, and I will not hurt you. [Laughter.]

Mr. MACDOUGALL. That is what you told us in 1861.

Mr. HILL. I simply say that I was reading the evidence of cruelties, in the language of that letter, "inseparable from prison life." Then I read of the small-pox epidemic at Elmira and its character. But the remark which the gentleman is now commenting on was not connected with any charge of inhumanity upon any person in the world. I wish it distinctly understood that I meant to charge inhumanity upon nobody. I was simply speaking of those horrors that are inseparable from all prison life; and I wound up my statement by saying that the official reports of Secretary Stanton, on the 19th of July, 1866, after the war was over, gave the relative mortality of prisoners in Federal hands and prisoners in confederate hands, and that the mortality of confederate prisoners in northern prisons was 12 per cent., while the mortality of Federal prisoners in confederate hands was less than 9 per cent. Now, I simply said that judging by that test there was more atrocity (if you please to call it so)—I meant, of course, mortality—in the prisons of the North than in those of the South. Let the gentleman take the benefit of that statement. I simply referred to the report of Secretary Stanton.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Does the gentleman mean to charge that the amount of mortality in northern prisons was owing to any cruelty or neglect of the Federal officers?

Mr. HILL. I do not undertake to say to what special cause the mortality on either side was attributable. I say it was attributable to those horrors inseparable from prison life everywhere; and I simply entered my protest against gentlemen seeking to stir up those old past horrors on either side, to keep alive a strife that ought to be buried. That is all. [Applause.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad to hear what the gentleman says, and to give it more force by contrast I quote again the words he used as reported in the newspapers this morning:

> When the gentleman from Maine addresses the House again let him add to it that the atrocities of Andersonville do not begin to compare with the atrocities of Elmira, of Fort Douglas, or of Fort Delaware; and of all the atrocities, both at Andersonville and Elmira, the confederate government stands acquitted from all responsibility and blame.

I refer to it to show why I could not——

Mr. HILL. I have no doubt the gentleman's motive is good; but he will permit me to remind him that what he has just read was said by me after reading Secretary Stanton's report; and, of course, while I mentioned prison places at the North I did not mean to charge inhumanity upon any one as a class.

Mr. GARFIELD. But let me say another word to close this branch of the subject. The authority introduced as to the atrocity at Elmira was an anonymous letter printed in the New York World. The Roman soldiers who watched at the sepulcher of the Savior of mankind attempted to disprove his resurrection by testifying to what happened while they were asleep. Bad as this testimony was, it was not anonymous; but in this case the testimony was that of a shadow—an initial—nobody. Stat nominis umbra. What the substance was we know not. But even as to this anonymous authority, it would have been well for the cause of justice if the gentleman had been kind enough to quote it all. I read, I believe, from the very book from which the gentleman quoted—The Life of Davis—a sentence omitted by him, but which I hope he will have printed in his speech. It is this:

> The facts demonstrate that in as healthy a location as there is in New York, with every remedial appliance in abundance, with no epidemic, &c.

So that even this anonymous witness testifies that we planted our Elmira prison in as healthy a place as there was in the State of New York. It ought to be added that the small-pox broke out in that prison very soon after the date of this letter, and the mortality that followed was very much greater than in any other prison in the North.

How we have kept alive our vindictiveness will be seen by the fact that Congress, at its last session or the session before last, passed a law making the rebel cemetery at Elmira a part of the national-cemetery system; and to-day this malignant Administration, this ferocious Constitution-hating and South-hating Administration is paying an officer for tenderly caring for the inclosure that holds the remains of these outraged soldiers!

Mr. MACDOUGALL. And a Union soldier, Captain Fitch, is building at his own expense a monument at Elmira to the confederate dead.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not know that.

At another place, Finn's Point, in Virginia, we have within the past few months embraced another cemetery of rebel soldiers under the law and the protection of our national-cemetery system. All this out of the depths of our wrath and hatred for our southern brethren!

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word on that point?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. In response to what the gentleman has said, I desire to state as a fact what I personally know, that on the last occasion of decorating soldiers' graves in the South, our people, uniting with northern soldiers there, decorated in harmonious accord the graves of the fallen Federals and the graves of the fallen confederates. It is because of this glorious feeling that is being awakened in the country that I protest against the revival of these horrors about any prison.

Mr. GARFIELD. So do I. Who brought it here? [Cries from the Democratic side of the House, BLAINE! BLAINE!] We will see as to that. I wish this same fraternal feeling could come out of the graveyard and display itself toward the thirty or forty maimed Union soldiers who were on duty around this Capitol, but who have been displaced by an equal number of soldiers on the other side. [Applause.]

There was another point which the gentleman made which I am frank to say I am not now able to answer.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention (with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio) to the exact state of facts in reference to the allegation just made by him. This is not the first time the statement has been made that there have been thirty or forty crippled Federal soldiers removed from office under this House and their places filled by confederate soldiers. I was shown yesterday morning by the Doorkeeper of the House (and the information is as accessible to the gentleman from Ohio and all others as to myself) a roll showing there were eighteen Federal soldiers appointed by the Doorkeeper of the House during the last Congress, while twenty-four Federal soldiers have been appointed by the Doorkeeper of the present Congress; while at the same time the aggregate number of appointments allowed to the Doorkeeper of the House of the last Congress was very much larger than that allowed to the Doorkeeper of the present Congress. Besides that, more than three-fourths of those appointed by the present Doorkeeper have taken what is popularly denominated as the iron-clad oath.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall be glad to know that the gentleman from Texas is correct, but such is not my understanding.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The gentleman from Texas has referred to a list which I have here before me.

Mr. GARFIELD. My time is fast running out, and I do not want it all taken up by these explanations; but I will hear my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. RANDALL. Your time will be extended.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The statement which I have before me, and to which the gentleman from Texas referred, is that, of the one hundred and fifty-three appointments made by the Doorkeeper in the last House of Representatives, there were eighteen Union soldiers; while, out of the eighty-five appointments allowed to the Doorkeeper of the present House, twenty-six Union soldiers have been appointed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. These demonstrations are entirely out of order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. My point is this: I do not know whether it is a point of order or not, but I do request that the Speaker will in the most determined manner suppress any applause in this House. I regret this debate, and especially these details; but this applause is unbecoming the gravity of the question, however unfortunately it may have come up here; and I do request that on this side of the House there shall be no applause of any member who speaks for the South or any demonstration against any one speaking on that side of the House. I hope courtesy and decorum will be observed. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!"] It is unbecoming the House and unbecoming the country, and I hope it will be stopped.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky is well made. These things are not in order, and the Chair earnestly requests the House will set an example to those outside of the bar and in the galleries by stopping all such demonstrations. And the Chair takes occasion to say to the galleries that if these things are continued it will be his duty to have them cleared.

Mr. GARFIELD. I regret as much as any one the discussion of this question. I did not intend to refer to it at all. I hope what my colleague has presented as a statistical table will turn out to be correct. I shall be glad if it does. I know he thinks it is correct. However, there has been put into my hand a statement about a single office of the House in which the names of the old and new rolls are given. I speak of the post-office of the House, in which it is claimed that while nine Union soldiers were on the rolls during the last year, nine confederate soldiers have replaced them on the roll of this year; and that of the thirteen employés there but two took the oath that they had not borne arms against the Government. If the statement be correct which I have had put into my hands, it would seem to throw some shadow of doubt on what we have just heard. But let both statements go in together.

This is the list handed to me:

POST-OFFICE OF THE HOUSE.

The old force.—Norman Crane, Vermont; A. M. Legg, New York, two years in Union Army; F. A. Wardell, Massachusetts, four years in Union Army and permanently disabled at Winchester; J. H. Paine, Ohio, was in Union Army; O. M. Thomas, Iowa; R. P. Bishop, Michigan, lost an arm in the Union Army; R. S. McMichael, Wisconsin, nearly lost his sight in Union Army; D. B. Bradley, Wisconsin, three years in Union Army; J. H. Lytle, New York; W. B. Sessions, New York; J. D. Severn, Pennsylvania; D. F. Bishop, Pennsylvania; W. Tudge, District of Columbia; Cripti Palmoni, District of Columbia.

The new force.—George W. Rock, Virginia, in confederate army; Henry Cook, Virginia, in confederate army; Richard Allen, Virginia; S. W. Kennedy, Virginia, in confederate army; A. W. C. Nowlin, Virginia, in confederate army; Edward C. Sloss, Virginia; W. H. Robinson, Virginia, in confederate army; J. R. Fisher, Virginia, in confederate army; P. S. Goodsil, W. B. Lowery, Virginia, in confederate army; Joseph M. Taylor, Edwin Este, Virginia, in confederate army; Thomas Kirby, Connecticut, in Union Army.

Mr. Speaker, I was about to refer to another point made by the gentleman from Georgia in his statement of the number of prisoners taken by us and taken by them and the relative number of deaths. I have this morning received from the Surgeon-General references to all the pages of official reports on that subject, but I have not been able, in the hurried moments of the session since I arrived here, to examine the figures. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has made up a part of the statement which I am now able to present. That statement shows that during the war we took 476,169 prisoners, while on the other side they took 188,145 prisoners from us.

This is a statement to which the Surgeon-General referred me in a note received since I took my seat in the House this morning, and is in a printed report on the treatment of prisoners of war by the rebel authorities, third session Fortieth Congress, page 228, which gentlemen can examine at their leisure.

It ought to be added in this connection that the conscription laws of the confederate congress forced all able-bodied citizens between the ages of seventeen and fifty into the service, while our laws limited the conscription to the usual military ages. This, of course, put into their army a large number of immature boys and broken-down old men, among whom the mortality would naturally be greater than in an army made up of men of the ordinary ages.

I turn now to another point. The gentleman makes another answer concerning these atrocities.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. HILL. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be permitted to go on.

There being no objection, Mr. GARFIELD'S time was extended indefinitely.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very grateful for this courtesy, and will not abuse it.

The gentleman from Georgia makes another answer, that whatever was suffered by the prisoners for at least a considerable portion of the time was in consequence of our refusal to make an exchange of prisoners, because we would not give them their fresh men in our prisons and take our shadows and skeletons that came back from theirs.

This is a part, and an important part, of a great history, which must not be omitted in this debate; and I will very briefly refer to its leading points. There was much trouble about the exchange of prisoners between the two belligerents; first, because for a long time we did not acknowledge the confederates as belligerents. We hoped under the ninety-days theory of Mr. Seward to get through without their recognition, but that hope failed. Our enemies were as gallant a people as ever drew the sword, and the fulfillment of that hope was delayed for months and for years. But finally an arrangement was made under which it was possible to make a cartel for the exchange of prisoners, and on the 22d of July, 1862, a cartel was agreed upon between the belligerents, which provided that within ten days after a prisoner was taken he should be paroled and sent home, and whenever it was announced by either side that a certain number was relieved from the parole a corresponding number should be released from the other side, and in that way the exchange was effected.

There were two points of delivery of prisoners. One was at Vicksburgh. Another was at a point near Dutch Gap, in Virginia. And the exchange went on for some time until a series of events occurred which interrupted it. To those events I desire to call attention for a moment. The first in order of time was a proposition which was read before the House yesterday, and which I incorporate here in my remarks, not for the sake of making any personal point, but to preserve the continuity of the history.

In October, 1862, a resolution was introduced into the confederate senate by Senator Hill, of Georgia—

That every person pretending to be a soldier or officer of the United States who shall be captured on the soil of the Confederate States after the 1st of January, 1863, shall be presumed to have entered the territory of the Confederate States with intent to excite insurrection and to abet murder, and that unless satisfactory proof be adduced to the contrary before the military court before which his trial shall be had he shall suffer death.

That was the first step in the complication in regard to the exchange of prisoners of war. That resolution appears to have borne early fruits.

On the 22d day of December, 1862, Jefferson Davis, the man for whom amnesty is now being asked, issued a proclamation, a copy of which I hold in my hand. I read two paragraphs:

First. That all commissioned officers in the command of said Benjamin F. Butler be declared not entitled to be considered as soldiers engaged in honorable warfare, but as robbers and criminals deserving death; and that they, and each of them, be, whenever captured, reserved for execution.

Mr. HILL. A reason is stated for that.

Mr. GARFIELD. The reason is in the preamble. I am not discussing the reasons for this extraordinary proclamation, but its effects upon the exchange of prisoners.

Third. That all negro slaves captured in arms be at once delivered over to the executive authorities of the respective States to which they belong, to be dealt with according to the laws of said States.

Fourth. That the like orders be executed in all cases with respect to all commissioned officers of the United States when found serving in company with said slaves in insurrection against the authorities of the different States of this confederacy.

Two great questions were thus raised: first, that a certain class of officers, merely because they served under General Butler, should be declared not entitled to the rights of prisoners of war, but should be put to death when taken. These men were serving, not Benjamin F. Butler, but the Union. They did not choose him as their general. They were assigned to him, and by this proclamation that assignment consigned them to death at the hands of their captors. But the second question was still more important. It was an order that all men who had been slaves and had enlisted under the flag of the Union should be denied all the rights of soldiers, and when captured should be dealt with as runaway slaves under the laws of the States where they formerly belonged, and that commissioned officers who commanded them were to be denied the rights and privileges of prisoners of war. The decision of the Union people everywhere was that, great as was the suffering of our poor soldiers at Andersonville and elsewhere, we would never make an exchange of prisoners until the manhood and the rights of our colored soldiers were acknowledged by the belligerent power. And for long weary months we stood upon that issue, and most of the suffering occurred while we waited for that act of justice to be done on the other side.

To enforce this proclamation of Mr. Davis a law passed on the 1st of May, 1863, by the confederate congress, reported, doubtless, from the judiciary committee by the gentleman who spoke yesterday, and in that law the principles of the proclamation I have just read were embodied and expanded. Section 4 of the law reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That every white person, being a commissioned officer or acting as such, who, during the present war, shall command negroes or mulattoes in arms against the Confederate States, or who shall arm, train, organize, or prepare negroes or mulattoes for military service against the Confederate States, or who shall voluntarily aid negroes or mulattoes in any military enterprise, attack, or conflict in such service, shall be deemed as inciting servile insurrection, and shall, if captured, be put to death or be otherwise punished, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. Every person, being a commissioned officer or acting as such in the service of the enemy, who shall during the present war excite, attempt to excite, or cause to be excited, a servile insurrection, or who shall incite or cause to be incited a slave to rebel, shall, if captured, be put to death or be otherwise punished, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 7. All negroes and mulattoes who shall be engaged in war or be taken in arms against the Confederate States, or shall give aid or comfort to the enemies of the Confederate States, shall, when captured in the Confederate States, be delivered to the authorities of the State or States in which they shall be captured, to be dealt with according to the present or future laws of such State or States.

Approved May 1, 1863.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am here to say that this position taken by the head of the confederacy, indorsed by his congress and carried into execution by his officers, was the great primal trouble in all this business of the exchange of prisoners. There were minor troubles, such as claims by both sides that paroles had been violated. I think General Halleck reported that a division of four brigades, Stevenson's division, which had not been properly exchanged, fought us at Lookout Mountain; but that may have been a mistake. It was one of the points in controversy. But the central question was that of the Government of the United States having committed itself to the doctrine that the negro was a man and not a chattel, and that being a man he had a right to help us in fighting for the Union, and being a soldier we would perish rather than that he should not be treated as a soldier.

To show that I am not speaking at random I will read from a report which I hold in my hand, a report of the Secretary of War on the difficulty of the exchange of prisoners. This paper is dated August 24, 1864. I think it is a misprint for 1863, from what surrounds it; but no matter as to that. It was in August General Meredith reported:

To my demand "that all officers commanding negro troops, and negro troops themselves, should be treated as other prisoners of war, and be exchanged as such," Mr. Ould declined acceding, remarking that they (the rebels) would "die in the last ditch" before giving up the right to send slaves back to slavery as property recaptured.

* * * * * * * *

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. A. MEREDITH,
Brigadier-General and Commissioner for Exchange.

Major-General E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Commissioner for Exchange of Prisoners, Washington, D. C.

Thus it appears that in the negotiation, as late as the month of August, 1863, the refusal of the rebel authorities to treat the negro as a man and a soldier prevented the exchange of prisoners.

One other point in that connection and I will leave this subject. I have here a letter, dated March 17, 1863, written by Robert Ould and addressed to that man of "bad eminence," General Winder, in which Mr. Ould, speaking of his arrangement for the exchange of prisoners, says:

The arrangements that I have made work largely in our favor. We get rid of a set of miserable wretches and receive some of the best material I ever saw.

Now in that single line, in a communication between two men, not par nobile fratrum but par turpe diabolorum, is proof that the object of this outrageous treatment at Andersonville was to make our men so that their exchange would be valueless to us, and it throws light upon the charge about our treatment of prisoners held in the North.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I return from all this to the direct discussion bearing immediately upon Jefferson Davis. It seems to me incontrovertible that the records I have adduced, lay at his door the charge of being himself the author, the conscious author, through his own appointed instrument, of the terrible work at Andersonville, for which the American people still hold him unfit to be admitted among the legislators of this nation.

Before I leave that subject let me say another word on another point. I see around me here a large number of gentlemen who did not hesitate to take the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States, who did not hesitate to ask to be relieved of their political disabilities; and I ask if any one of them, in the years they have served here with us, has been ever taunted with the fact that he has been thus relieved of disabilities at his own request? Can any one of them recall a discourteous remark that has ever been made here in debate because he has asked and accepted the amnesty of the Government? Do you want us to say that the remaining seven hundred and fifty need not ask as you did? Do the honorable gentlemen who are here to-day want easier terms on which the others may come in than the terms on which they themselves came back?

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask a question for information, for I want the facts, and my recollection differs from that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The act of 1872, granting a partial amnesty to quite a large number, does not, as I understand it, make any such requisition as is contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. HILL. It was an unconditional amnesty like that contained in the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] It required no oath or anything of the sort.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not.

Mr. HILL. I am very sure that it was under that act that I was relieved. And I never applied for any amnesty at all, but I would not have felt it any loss of pride had I done so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not. I remember very well that we relieved a large number of soldiers in one act. But we did not relieve those who, at the time the rebellion broke out, held offices and commissions under the Government which they had sworn before God they would protect and defend, and afterward went into the rebellion. Those are the people that we have required to ask for amnesty.

Mr. HILL. Allow me to call the attention of the gentleman to a correction of his statement. The act of Congress of 1872 relieved all persons, as I understand it, from disabilities who had been members of any State Legislature, or who had been an executive or judicial officer of any State, and relieved all in civil or military service, or who had even been in the Congress of the United States, excepting the Thirty-fifth or Thirty-sixth Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses.

Mr. HILL. Well, one or the other. It relieved all those who were not in Congress at the time of secession, all members of State Legislatures, all civil and military officers, except the few remaining, some seven hundred and fifty. You granted them relief without any condition whatever.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will observe that those to whom he refers did not, at the time the war broke out, hold commissions as United States officers.

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. GARFIELD. We excepted from amnesty all those who held in their hands a commission from the Federal Government, and who had sworn to be true to their commission; and we did this because they had added to rebellion—I must use words—the crime of perjury in the eyes of the law.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio, speaking here to-day of kindness to gentlemen on this side of the House, to say that any man who held a commission under the United States at the time the war broke out, and who went into secession, was guilty of perjury?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will repeat precisely the measured words I used. I said "the crime of perjury in the eyes of the law." In view of the fact of flaming war, I do not say those men should be regarded as ordinary perjurers; I never said that. But what will the gentleman call it? By what other name does the law know it? I did not make the dictionary, nor did I make the law. The gentleman certainly knows me well enough to know that I am incapable of making a reference to any personal matter in this discussion. He must see that I am using the word in its technical meaning as used in the law.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.) Does the gentleman from Ohio yield further to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER?]

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not ask to interrupt the gentleman that I may excuse myself, but to excuse some of the noblest men that I have ever known, and of whom the gentleman might be proud to claim to be a peer.

Mr. GARFIELD. There were some passages in the speech of yesterday which make me less reluctant to speak of breaking oaths. He said:

> We charge all our wrongs to that "higher law" fanaticism which never kept a pledge or obeyed a law. We sought to leave the association of those who would not keep fidelity to covenant. We sought to go by ourselves; but, so far from having lost our fidelity to the Constitution, we hugged it to our bosoms and carried it with us. * * * But you gentlemen who persecuted us by your infidelities until you drove us out of the Union, you who then claimed to be the only friends of the Union, which you had before denounced as a "league with hell and a covenant with death," you who follow up the war when the soldiers who fought it have made peace and gone to their homes, to you we have no concessions to make. Martyrs owe no apology to tyrants.

There is a certain sublimity of assumption in this which challenges admiration. Why, the very men of whom we are talking who broke their oaths of office to the nation—when we are speaking of relieving them we are told that they went out because we broke the Constitution and would not be bound by oaths Did we break the Constitution? Did we drive them out? I invoke the testimony of Alexander H. Stephens, now a member of this House, who standing up in the secession convention of Georgia declared that there was no just ground for Georgia's going out; declared that the election of a President according to the Constitution was no justifiable ground for secession, and declared that if under the circumstances the South should go out she would herself be committing a gigantic wrong and would call down upon herself the thunders and horrors of civil war.

Thus spoke Alexander H. Stephens in 1860. Over against anything that may be said to the contrary I place his testimony that we did not force the South out; that they went out against all the protests and the prayers and the humiliation that a great and proud nation could make without absolute disgrace.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman has used a term that touches the honor of more men than one in this House and in the South. I desire, therefore, to ask him this question: Whether the war did not result from a difference of views between gentlemen of the North and gentlemen of the South with regard to what was the true construction of the Constitution? That being so, I desire to ask him further whether the oath of fidelity to the Constitution was best observed by those people of the section which he represents, those of his own party, who declared that there was a law higher than the Constitution and declined to obey that instrument, or by those who observed faithfully their constitutional obligations, and who, when raids were made upon them, merely defended themselves, as they understand it, from unconstitutional aggression?

I wish to say further for myself and for those who are here with me that, the Constitution having been amended—the "higher law" party having incorporated in that instrument the abolition of slavery and certain other features which we have now sworn to support along with the rest of the instrument—if in the future we fail to observe that oath before high Heaven, then we may be declared perjured; then we may be declared rebels; then we may be declared traitors.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman has understood me he cannot fail to see that I have not used the word in any offensive sense, but in its plain and ordinary acceptation, as used in the law. We held that the United States was a nation, bound together by a bond of perpetual union; a union which no State or any combination of States, which no man or any combination of men, had the right, under the Constitution, to break. The attempt of the South to overthrow the Union was rebellion against the Government. It can be described by no other name. It is so known to the laws of nations. It is so described in the decisions of the Supreme Court.

The gentleman from North Carolina calls the war on our side a raid. I will never consent to call our war for the Union "a raid," least of all a raid upon the rights of any human being. I admit that there was a political theory of State rights—a theory held, I have no doubt, by gentlemen like the gentleman of Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] who spoke a moment ago—believed in as sincerely as I believe the opposite—which led them to think it was their duty to go when their State went. I admit that that greatly mitigates all that the law speaks of as a violation of an oath. But I will never admit (for history gives the lie to the statement in every line) that the men of the Union were making a "raid" upon the rights of the South.

Read the republican platform of 1856 and of 1860. What did we contend for in those years? Simply that slavery should not be extended into any Territory already free. That was all. We forswore any right or purpose on our part in time of peace to touch slavery in any State. We only claimed that in the Territories, the common heritage of all the Union, slavery should never travel another inch; and thank God it no longer pollutes our soil or disgraces our civilization.

Now that slavery, the guilty cause of the rebellion, is no more, and that, so far as I know, nobody wants it restored—I do not believe these gentlemen from the South desire its restoration——

Mr. HILL. We would not have it.

Mr. GARFIELD. They would not have it, the gentleman from Georgia says. Then let us thank God that in the fierce flames of war the institution of slavery has been consumed; and out of its ashes let us hope a better than the fabled phœnix of old will arise—a love of the Union high and deep, "as broad and general as the casing air," enveloping us all, and that it shall be counted no shame for any man who is not still under political disabilities to say with uplifted hand, "I will be true to it and take the proffered amnesty of the nation." But let us not tender it to be spurned; if it is worth having, it is worth asking for.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I close as I began. Toward those men who gallantly fought us on the field I cherish the kindest feeling. I feel a sincere reverence for the soldierly qualities which they displayed on many a well-fought battle-field. I hope the day will come when their swords and ours will be crossed over many a door-way of our children, who will remember the glory of their ancestors with pride. The high qualities displayed in that conflict now belong to the whole nation. Let them be consecrated to the Union and its future peace and glory. I shall hail that consecration as a pledge and symbol of our perpetuity.

But there was a class of men referred to in the speech of the gentleman yesterday for whom I have never yet gained the Christian grace necessary to say the same thing. The gentleman said that amid the thunder of battle, and through its dun smoke, and above its roar they heard a voice from this side saying, "Brothers, come." I do not know whether he meant the same thing, but I heard that voice behind us. I heard that voice, and I recollect that I sent one of those who uttered it through my lines—a voice owned by Vallandigham. [Laughter.] General Scott said, in the early days of the war, "When this war is over it will require all the physical and moral power of the Government to restrain the rage and fury of the non-combatants." [Laughter.] It was that non-combatant voice behind us that cried "halloo!" to the other side, that always gave cheer and encouragement to the enemy in our hour of darkness. I have never forgotten and have not yet forgiven those democrats of the North whose hearts were not warmed by the grand inspirations of the Union, but who stood back finding fault, always crying disaster, rejoicing at our defeat, never glorying in our victory. If these are the voices the gentleman heard, I am sorry he is now united with them.

But to the most noble men, democrats and republicans, who fought together for the Union, to them I commend all the lessons of charity that the wisest and most beneficent men have taught.

I join you all in every aspiration that you may express to stay in this Union, to heal its wounds, to increase its glory, and to forget the evils and bitternesses of the past; but do not, for the sake of the three hundred thousand heroic men who, maimed and bruised, drag out their weary lives, many of them with horrible memories of what they suffered in the prison pen—do not ask us to vote to put back into power that man who was the cause of their suffering—that man still unaneled, unshrived, unforgiven, undefended. [Great applause.]

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to continue this discussion in the line already taken, upon which line, it seems to me, quite sufficient has been said to satisfy the desire of either side. I only wish to refer to two points—and will occupy at the farthest not more than three minutes time—bearing upon this case. The first relates to the general question of amnesty, respecting which I take it there is no dispute. That question has been already settled; settled by previous votes of Congresses, and by the unmistakable voice of the people which those votes have expressed. Whether any one here might or might not object to the principle upon abstract grounds is of no consequence so far as relates to the point before the House, for we are all agreed that its establishment as the settled policy of the nation is now irreversible.

There is also, Mr. Speaker, no dispute respecting the actual fact of the horrors of Andersonville. One of the most striking, indeed I think I may say the most striking fact in the exhaustive speech of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] to which we listened yesterday, in which everything which could possibly be presented was brought forth in rebuttal of the awful charges of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE]—one of the most startling things in that speech to me was the entire absence of a single word disproving the terrible story of horrors of that prison. We are agreed that that story has not been exaggerated, and I think we are agreed also that exaggeration thereof is impossible.

But, Mr. Speaker, with all deference to the distinguished gentlemen who have preceded me—and novice as I am I would much prefer to sit at their feet than attempt to give instruction here—with all deference, I say, to their line of argument and opinion, yet as I look upon it the horrors of Andersonville have nothing to do with the precise matter before the House. That question, as I take it, does not involve a judicial decision, but a legislative enactment. What we are called upon to pronounce is not, as I understand it, the judgment of a court respecting a crime, but the decree of a legislature respecting the political rights of its subjects, and between these two there is a broad distinction and one sufficiently clear in its bearing upon the present issue.

I do not, Mr. Speaker, palliate the crime. God grant his mercy to the guilty author of it in his dreadful need! Neither would I extenuate or excuse any remissness of either the executive or the judicial departments of the Government in their treatment of this case. But I contend that the question before us does not relate to the punishment due for the crime of Andersonville. The amnesty upon which we have to decide, and which by section 3 of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress alone can confer, is expressly referred by the same section to those—

> Who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.

"Shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same." These are the clear lines beyond which I hold we have no right in a measure of this kind to go; and since within these lines the offense of the individual against whom exception is sought to be taken is no greater than that of others whose disabilities have been or are to be removed, I cannot agree to the existence of any proper exception in his case.

I was obliged Monday to vote against the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] as I should be compelled to do again if presented in the same form, not because I object to the subjects whom he would include in his offer of amnesty, but because the terms in which that offer is made seem very far from meeting the just requirement. The boon we are ready to confer is surely worth the asking, and both for this reason and also out of respect for those who have already asked and received it, representatives from whom I for one welcome on this floor, I believe that the amnesty, if granted, should be received under some such conditions and in some such form as the resolution of the gentleman from Maine embodies. That is all I have to say at present.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to state this fact in connection with the second branch of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine: This proposition of amnesty seeks to remove disabilities from holding office. It will occur instantly to his mind that when those disabilities against his holding office are removed from any one and he should be chosen to an office, before he could enter upon that office he would of necessity be required to take an oath to support the Constitution.

Mr. SEELYE. Is not that the case at present?

Mr. RANDALL. Not as to those that are embraced in the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution. That is the reason why we have considered unnecessary and continued to resist that branch of the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Suppose he should not be elected to office?

Mr. RANDALL. Then your removal of his disabilities does no good.

Mr. FRYE. Then he is restored to equal citizenship in every respect without asking for it.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will understand that the disability in the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments applied to his holding office. That we proposed to remove by the amnesty. Now when he shall come to be elected he will of necessity have to take an oath to support the Constitution.

Mr. FRYE. But he can go into a nominating convention and be the nominee of his party without taking an oath.

Mr. RANDALL. He can do that now under the reconstruction acts.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to put a question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman who introduced this question of amnesty, which will bring him to consider a point which is omitted in his statement. He says to us that if the general amnesty is passed as proposed by him it will have no effect unless one who is amnestied be elected to office, when he must then take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. That is very well. But let me suppose this case: that Mr. Jefferson Davis shall be included in the amnesty; that Mr. Jefferson Davis has taken a solemn oath to support a government hostile to the United States, and, accepting that amnesty, he becomes possessed of the highest rights that any man can enjoy in this country, without ever having taken any oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and still, with that oath upon his lips, to support a government hostile to the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I ask any member of the House, if Jefferson Davis has, under the different laws passed by the Congress of the United States and under the proclamation of President Johnson, if under any of these measures, he has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know; but I do know, and if am not correct I can be informed, that Jefferson Davis to-day can exercise every privilege of an American citizen excepting those from which he is debarred by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I will try to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts. I do not know as a fact whether Mr. Davis has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States or not. But I know this, which induces me to suppose that he has done so: that no men, so far as I am informed, (and I know of the cases of many,) who were held as prisoners by the Federal Government, were at any time released from that imprisonment without being required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. And I presume it is a fact that Mr. Davis was not accorded immunity on that subject which was not accorded to others.

Mr. BANKS. I do not see that the gentleman from Texas meets my point. Under a proclamation of President Johnson and under an act of Congress of 1866, I think it was, and the act of 1867, for the reconstruction of the Government, every man who assumed or obtained any rights under those acts was required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. So far as I am able to ascertain, and I shall be glad to be corrected if I am misinformed, no man connected with the rebellion enjoys any political rights now excepting such as he has obtained under one of those acts, where, as a condition-precedent, he was required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Now, if we pass a general amnesty bill—and I voted for the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] the other day, although not entirely satisfied with it—we give amnesty to Jefferson Davis; and he has not taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, but he has taken an oath to support a government hostile to the United States; and, never having abjured that oath, he is still under fealty to that government in enmity to the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BANKS. Well, sir, I got up to ask a question myself.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I simply wish to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order. I inquire who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. ATKINS. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] so far as that part of it which provides for the taking of the oath is concerned.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not the power to accept an amendment now, but I may have hereafter.

Mr. BANKS. I intend, if I have an opportunity, to propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maine so as to strike out the words relating to Jefferson Davis, and I shall ask the House that that portion of the amendment which will require Jefferson Davis to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States shall be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. HILL. I see the point of the gentleman from Massachusetts, for whom I have great respect. His point is that Jefferson Davis took an oath to support the confederate government, and that of course, until he takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, he is bound by that oath. The gentleman is analogizing his case to the case of naturalization into citizenship. Now, I desire to ask him, can the obligation to support a government continue after the government is dead?

Mr. BANKS. Jefferson Davis can so understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Well, I undertake to say this: that if Jefferson Davis does so understand it he is the only man in the South who does so. The confederate government is dead, and we intend it to be dead forever.

Mr. RANDALL. I now demand the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] but I will withdraw it so as to enable him to have one hour in reply. Of course, if the previous question were sustained, I could not allow that to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot agree, as the gentleman will readily perceive, to speak under any other condition than that which gives me a right to do so under the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I submit that question to the Chair to be decided under the rules.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire again to call the attention of the Speaker to the sixty-third rule of the House. I have either the right to speak or not. With the Speaker's leave, I will read the rule.

No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House, unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending; in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Now, the "matter pending" is the motion to reconsider, and I was "the mover," the "proposer," and the "introducer" of that motion.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to page 86 of Barclay's Digest.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the very page from which I was reading.

Mr. RANDALL. And I would also call the attention of the Speaker to Rule 60.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on this point. In the judgment of the Chair it is not competent for a member upon such a motion as this to make it impossible for this House to terminate debate——

Mr. BLAINE. O no! I do not claim so, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Except with his consent.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not claim any such thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have the kindness to hear the Chair. If the position assumed by the gentleman from Maine be sound, it appears to the Chair that this House would be deprived of power to terminate debate except upon his motion.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all; far from it.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg to entirely dissent from that view of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. BANKS. I want the decision of the Chair to be stated without interruption.

The SPEAKER. The point of the gentleman is well taken. [Laughter.] It is claimed that, because the motion in this case to reconsider the vote by which the amnesty bill was defeated was made by the gentleman from Maine, therefore he is entitled to open and close the debate, practically to control it. The Chair invites the attention of the House to the sixtieth rule, on page 88 of the Digest, a part of which the Chair will read:

No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate.

The gentleman from Maine did not report this measure from a committee. A ruling is given on page 86 of the Digest, which is as follows:

The right of the "member reporting the measure" to open and close debate is not affected by an order either for the previous question or that debate shall cease in committee.

Now the Chair is very reluctant to hold that in this case the gentleman from Maine is not of right entitled to close this debate. The Chair would prefer to hold that under this ruling, which relates to Rule 60, the right of the gentleman to close the debate is clear, notwithstanding the House may have sustained the previous question; that, in other words, he would be entitled, after the previous question is sustained, to close the debate. But upon the peculiar attitude of this question, the Chair feels compelled to rule that, inasmuch as the gentleman from Maine did not report this bill to the House from any committee or in any other way, he has no right to close the debate or to speak after the previous question shall have been demanded by another member, as in this case.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Chair be good enough to allow me to address him?

The SPEAKER. Most certainly, with great pleasure.

Mr. BLAINE. The Chair very correctly states that I do not have the relation to this measure of having reported it from a committee, and the Chair will observe that no other gentleman has that relation to it; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] does not have that relation to the measure. It does not come from a committee. Therefore, if the Chair will observe, Rule 88, which regulates the order of debate upon any measure reported from a committee, has no pertinency whatever to this case. With all due respect to the Chair, it does not apply to it at all. We all know that in the regular morning hour, when committees are reporting, that rule applies specifically as to the conduct of debate.

Now, this being a measure not reported from a committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no more relation of authority in regard to it than I myself. He merely proposed it by the grace of the Speaker giving him the floor. Therefore he has not so much relation to it as myself, because his obtaining the floor was entirely ex gratia from the Speaker, while I took the floor because I was entitled to it under the rule upon a question so highly privileged that nothing but a motion to adjourn could take me from the floor. I hold the floor under the rules of the House. I am "the mover," I am "the introducer," I am the "proposer"—I like to adhere to the very language of the rule—"of the matter pending," and this Rule 63, if the Chair will observe, was made to regulate precisely that kind of business which does not come from a committee. The Chair is quite correct in quoting Rule 88 as applicable to business which comes from a committee; but this regulates the respective and relative rights of members with regard to that class of business which does not come from committees.

Now, it does not do, of course, to confuse the majority side of the House and the minority side. Under the rules of the House we are all equal. I have not the remotest possible desire to continue this debate beyond the wish of the other side. I went myself to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] this morning and told him that I would entirely consult his wishes, recognizing that the majority have the right——

Mr. RANDALL. Did you not find me in quite the same temper?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly, sir. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, like myself, is always, unless excited a little, a man of amiable temper and generous impulses. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the last thing I should desire, as the Chair himself knows, would be to come into conflict with the Chair upon anything. There are personal reasons, there are official reasons, that render me reluctant to have a discussion of this kind with the Chair. I would much prefer if the point could be avoided. I desire to address the House to-morrow morning for one hour, or possibly a little longer, if the grace of the House will permit. I beg the Speaker not to rule me out of that privilege, for his sake as well as mine.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word on this question of order, because it is a very important one. The rule which gives a member the right to open and close the debate upon a measure which he has reported from a committee was adopted from an extreme necessity, which long experience showed to exist. The chairman of a committee, reporting a measure and not having the right to close the debate, was liable to encounter an argument or an onslaught from an opponent of the measure who might accidentally get the floor, and thus defeat, for want of proper opportunity of reply, a measure of absolute importance which had come from a committee. For this reason, and in view of this absolute necessity, the rule was adopted. If it were abrogated we could not carry on the business of the Government. But no rule has ever been adopted which would give to a member who with the consent of the House may present a resolution or other proposition the right to open and close the debate, just the same as if he were reporting a measure from a committee—an appropriation bill, for instance, necessary for the support of the Government; because in such a case the necessity does not exist. Therefore upon that ground the Speaker is perfectly right. But there is another answer to the claim of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HOAR. Will my colleague [Mr. BANKS] be kind enough to state to what class of cases Rule 63 does apply?

Mr. BANKS. It applies——

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order. I submit that this discussion is all out of order. I understand the Chair to have decided the point, and the only way to oppose the decision is by an appeal to the House.

Mr. BANKS. I will not occupy long.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has the floor by consent; and it is the request of the Chair that he may not be interrupted.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I did not intend to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts. I thought he had yielded the floor. I only wished to stop the indefinite continuance of this debate.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the only rule relating to this subject applies to reports from committees made by the chairman or any other member.

Mr. HOAR. This is an important point; and I hope my colleague will state to what cases Rule 63 applies. The rule about reports from committees is another rule. But here is a rule that must apply to some other cases.

Mr. BANKS. But it is the same subject. That, however, is not the point. Sir, the Chair is sustained upon another ground. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine is not a measure; it is a motion—a subsidiary and incidental motion. It is not a measure—it is not his measure—but a privilege or right belonging to any member of the majority to make that motion, and therefore he cannot claim the right to open and close upon the ground that the motion is a measure. A motion which belongs to every other member of the majority is not a measure like that reported by the chairman of a committee or presented to the House by a member.

More than that, the motion to reconsider is in its nature subject to exactly the same rules as a motion to postpone a question indefinitely. Now, a member has a right to move to postpone a measure indefinitely. That is a motion such as a motion to reconsider, but making that motion does not give him the right to open and close the debate on that motion. Upon these grounds the Chair is perfectly right, and no sounder decision was ever given in the House.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes a mistake when he speaks of this thing being a "measure." The sixty-third rule does not use the word "measure." It reads "upon any matter pending." More than that, the gentleman from Massachusetts makes another mistake. The sixty-third rule does not give, nor have I arrogated, the right to close debate—not at all. There is where the gentleman confuses the sixty-third with the eighty-eighth rule. The eighty-eighth rule gives the right to the member who reports a measure from a committee, the right absolutely, to close debate. I have claimed no such right. I have only claimed what the sixty-third rule gives me, the right to reply. Whether I am to be the last man who speaks is quite another thing. I have not under the sixty-third rule asked for that which the eighty-eighth rule gives to a member reporting a measure from a committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts, at whose feet I have gladly sat in the past, will observe those two vital and important distinctions in reference to which he has unintentionally fallen into error. The sixty-third rule does not refer to measures at all. It does not give the right to close debate at all. It gives the right to a member introducing or the mover; and the "mover" refers to the "motion," the gentleman will observe, and not to the "measure."

Mr. BANKS. The mover of the matter.

Mr. BLAINE. The "mover," but not the "matter pending." Of course you do not speak of the "mover of a measure." No, sir; the mover is the one who makes the motion.

I have not claimed the right, Mr. Speaker, to close this debate. I have claimed the right to reply, and the rule says that I can come in. The rule says—I will read the whole of it:

> No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House, unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending; in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if any other gentleman who has not spoken claims the floor at the same moment with myself you are bound under the rules to give the floor to that member. But no other member claiming it, I here claim the floor, and on that ask the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. The decision has been made. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to one point, and it is this: That his right to make the motion to reconsider came only from the fact that he voted on the prevailing side.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. Nevertheless he voted with the minority in this House.

Mr. BLAINE. But it was the majority then or the prevailing side, which is a parliamentary majority.

Mr. RANDALL. He has the right under the rule precisely as any member on this side of the House has, and no further logical right. He cannot control debate.

Mr. BLAINE. I never claimed the slightest right to close the debate, but I claim under the rules the right to reply.

Mr. RANDALL. And upon that the decision of the Chair has been made.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow the Chair to settle this question at once?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] The Chair desires only in addition to say, and he is glad to be able to say it, that in this ruling he is upon all points sustained by the venerable journal clerk of this House, the author of our Digest, who has had experience of twenty-eight years.

Mr. BLAINE. That I have no right now to the floor?

The SPEAKER. No right to the floor to close this debate.

Mr. BLAINE. It is not on that ground that I have claimed the floor, Mr. Speaker. That decision must not go on record as if I had claimed the floor to close this debate. No, sir.

Mr. BEEBE. I call the gentleman to order. The gentleman from Maine, having presided here for many years, is setting a bad example, an example unworthy of him and his reputation.

Mr. BLAINE. What I have claimed is the right to reply.

Mr. BEEBE. I insist on the order of the House being preserved.

The SPEAKER. Order must be restored. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania rose in his place, and, having been recognized by the Chair, demanded the previous question on the pending motion. Thereupon the gentleman from Maine claimed the right to be heard. The Chair decides he has no right to be heard, and that is all the Chair decides.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, in the abundance of caution, with a disposition to permit no fault to be found in any particular, I say to the gentleman from Maine who has asked that I shall give him one hour for debate——

Mr. BLAINE. He has done no such thing. He has refused to take it in that way.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman did at his desk ask me, or suggest that I should co-operate with him in asking this House to hear him for one hour to-morrow morning; and I, in the same spirit in which the gentleman made that request, met him. And I say to him now that I am willing to make a motion to adjourn, and if he will give me an assurance that at the end of his hour to-morrow he will again yield the floor to me to move the previous question, I will ask this House now to grant him that hour to-morrow. Or if he will do this——

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consider it, he will see that the request he makes of me, although I wish to speak with perfect respect, is absurd. He must think I have the disposal of the floor. He asks me if, at the end of the hour, I will give him the floor. During the last six years I could have answered that question. It is for you, Mr. Speaker, to answer it now. I give him the floor! If I am off the floor, what control have I of it? But I will say to the gentleman this: I will to-morrow accept the floor for a speech of one hour, and at the end of my speech I will move the previous question. I understood the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be an alternative one, one branch of which was that I should speak one hour and at the end of it move the previous question. I accept that.

Mr. RANDALL. My proposition was that you should yield the floor to me at the end of the hour to move the previous question. But I will go further. If you will, at the end of your hour, move the previous question, I will give you that hour.

Mr. BLAINE. Agreed.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HAYDEN'S ANNUAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY also submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be prepared 4,500 copies of Professor Hayden's annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1873, three thousand copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand for the use of the Senate, and five hundred copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

GEORGE P. MARSH.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, the bill (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland, and a certain present from the government of Italy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers George P. Marsh, the minister of the United States to the Kingdom of Italy, to accept a chronometer tendered him by the Republic of Switzerland, and a table tendered him by the Kingdom of Italy, in recognition of his services to those governments as arbitrator in a disagreement between them touching a question of boundary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAND-BOOK FOR THE USE OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer the following resolution, and ask its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of preparing a hand-book for the use of Congress embodying a brief account of the several Executive Departments of the Government, classifying and designating the several Bureaus, officers, and placemen connected therewith, and a brief account of the purposes and duties of each, and also a like account of the Senate and House of Representatives, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WEST. I do not think the Senate paid much attention to the reading of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. WEST. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me understand. Is this a resolution instructing a committee?

Mr. MERRIMON. A resolution instructing the Committee on Printing to inquire into the expediency of preparing a hand-book for the use of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to say that one of the great difficulties a new member of Congress experiences in the discharge of his duties here is to know how and where to find the information he needs. I have experienced this difficulty myself, and I think some of the older members have. The various Departments are very complex. It is important to know not only the various Departments, but the various Bureaus and offices, and the duties which each discharges. The object of the resolution is simply to instruct the Committee on Printing to inquire into the expediency of preparing a hand-book which shall afford this information readily, and which could be obtained by any new member of Congress in a week, instead of having to look through the various statutes and the various orders of the several Departments and the practice of the Departments, to get information which he is a long time in securing, and which he ought to have promptly at hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report to the Senate whether the act of March 1, 1792, (1 Statutes at Large, page 240,) is not defective, and if so, in what particulars, in making the necessary provisions for the various contingencies which may arise "in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of said office;" and if, in their opinion, such defects exist, what further or other legislation is best calculated to remedy such defects, and in that event that they report such bill or joint resolution as in their opinion the case may require.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no other resolutions the morning hour has expired, and the Chair will lay before the Senate a resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas there appear to be material alterations and discrepancies in the official finance reports of the Treasury Department as to the annual expenditures, receipts of the Government, and public debt, and particularly in the reports of 1869 to 1872, inclusive, which discrepancies and changes and alterations involve large amounts, and no satisfactory explanation appears on the face for the same: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the books and accounts of the Treasury Department, particularly with reference to discrepancies and alterations in amounts and figures that have been made in them, especially in the annual statements of the expenditures of the Government, revenue collected, and the public debt contained in said reports; and if any such discrepancies and alterations be found to exist, to report the same and the extent and nature thereof, the years wherein they occur, by what authority made, if any, the reasons that induced them, and to report generally such other and further information bearing upon the subject as to them may seem best; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance is necessarily absent to-day, that he postpone the consideration of the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The chairman of the Committee on Finance is necessarily absent to-day, and I therefore merely suggest to him the propriety of allowing this resolution to lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. If I knew that the Senator from Ohio desired to hear me I would certainly not go on, but it will be remembered that I have given notice that I would address the Senate to-day in support of the resolution just read. It is true that the Senator from Ohio, as I understand, has been unavoidably detained from the Senate to-day; but the senior Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who appears to have taken some interest in this matter, has, on perhaps three occasions, conferred with me, and knows that I am to submit my remarks to-day, and I also gave him notice of the line of argument which I expected to pursue. Unless it is insisted upon, notwithstanding the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I would prefer going on now. The Senator from Massachusetts is in the building and spoke with me this morning, asking me if I expected to make my remarks to-day. I told him I did. I have no objection to waiting until the Senator from Massachusetts comes in.

Mr. WEST. He is here now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think if the Senator from West Virginia knew the facts of the case he would wait until the chairman of the Committee on Finance is present, which will probably not be to-day.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator from West Virginia has some remarks to submit, and he can go on and make his speech now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator desires to make his speech to-day and then let the question go over for further action until to-morrow, I have no sort of objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in support of this resolution I beg to state that, in examining the finance reports of the Secretary of the Treasury that have been made for previous years, I have been astonished to find changes and alterations of figures in many of them, involving large amounts, causing them to differ widely from each other as to the transactions of the Treasury Department in the same years. These changes I am prepared to show from the reports increase the expenditures and public debt after the amounts thereof have been ascertained, officially reported, and stood upon the books of the Treasury Department for years, in the aggregate many millions of dollars, while in other years they decrease these amounts; and that they also decrease to the amount of millions the revenue collections that have been likewise ascertained, reported, and stood upon the books for years. If I am correct in my conclusions, I do not hesitate to declare that for certain years little confidence can or should be placed in the statements of the Treasury Department; and this fact becomes a serious question, demanding the earnest and best consideration of the Senate. And in the remarks I am about to make, which will be brief, feeling my position strong, my information accurate, being entirely from official sources, I shall thank any Senator if he has reason to question them, and feels that he can throw light upon the subject, to interrupt and correct me.

At the expense of being tedious to those not interested in such matters, I propose to deal almost exclusively with figures and facts as officially reported; comparisons I expect to make, with changes and alterations such as I expect to show, may compel unfavorable conclusions as to the management of the Treasury Department during certain years, but I disclaim all desire to reflect on the present efficient head of the Treasury Department or any of his predecessors.

CHANGE OF FIGURES AS TO EXPENDITURES.

I find on examination that all of the finance reports of the Treasury Department previous to the year 1870 substantially agree as to the total annual receipts and expenditures of the Government; but taking the finance report for 1870, I find that it differs as to the total annual receipts and expenditures from all like previous reports as to the years included between 1860–'61 and 1865–'66. For instance, in the finance report for 1869, on page 321, it will appear, commencing with the year 1860–'61, the total annual expenditures are stated as follows:

1861–'62	570, 841, 700 25
1862–'63	895, 796, 630 65
1863–'64	1, 298, 144, 656 00
1864–'65	1, 897, 674, 224 09
1865–'66	1, 141, 172, 666 09
Total	5, 888, 917, 190 16

Now, taking the finance report for 1870, at page 275, we find, commencing with the year 1860–'61, that the total annual expenditures are stated as follows:

1860–'61	$85, 387, 363 08
1861–'62	565, 667, 358 08
1862–'63	899, 815, 911 25
1863–'64	1, 295, 541, 114 86
1864–'65	1, 906, 433, 331 37
1865–'66	1, 139, 344, 081 95
Difference or increase	3, 271, 970 43

By comparing the above figures it will be seen that the total annual expenditures during the years named differ materially; for instance, in the report of 1869 the total annual expenditures for the year 1864–'65 are stated at $1,897,674,224.09. Now, in the report of 1870 the total annual expenditures for the same year, 1864–'65, are stated at $1,906,433,331.37, showing not only a wide difference, but, what is worse, an increase in the amount of nearly $900,000. That is, the report of 1870 increases the expenditures for the year 1864–'65 over the report for 1869 and previous reports for the same year about $9,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask the honorable Senator from West Virginia whether the two classes of figures to which he now refers are both drawn from the report of the Register of the Treasury, or whether one class of figures is drawn from the Register of the Treasury and the other from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senator is anticipating somewhat my remarks, but I will answer his question directly. I do not want to speak of the Secretary's table at present, further than to say that the first time it appears in any report is in 1870; and consequently I could not go back beyond that date for the Secretary's report.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That was all I desired to learn now.

Mr. DAVIS. The figures I am speaking from, so as to answer correctly, are taken from the report of the Register of the Treasury, whose official duty I understand has been from the organization of the Government to the present day to make up this table of annual statements and report it to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Taking the year 1862–'63, it will be seen that the report of 1870 increases the total annual expenditures of that year over the report for 1869 for the same year over $4,000,000. It will be further found that, taking all the years above named together, they are at times increased and then decreased; but the report of 1870 increases the average total expenditures of the Government during these years over the report of 1869 above $3,000,000. How it can be possible for the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer, after the total annual expenditures of the Government have been ascertained, fixed, and officially reported to Congress for several years in the finance reports for a certain year, to go back, as in some instances eight or ten years, and change this amount to a greater or less one, is something I cannot understand. It appears that the Register's reports for the years 1871 and 1872 differ materially as to the total annual expenditures of the Government for certain years, while the reports for 1872 and years following agree with each other. But I will not detain the Senate to note the difference in these two reports, but will confine myself to changes made in those of 1869 and 1870, and the years preceding.

The net ordinary expenditures of the Government for the year 1865, as stated in the finance report for 1869, are $1,212,911,270.41. The same expenditures for the same year, as stated in the finance report for 1870, is $1,214,349,195.43, showing an increase of $1,437,925.02. In other words, the finance reports of 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869, which agree with each other, show that the net ordinary expenditures of the Government were nearly one and one-half millions less than the report of 1870 shows them to have been for that year.

Taking the Navy, War, pension, and Indian expenditures especially from 1860 to 1866, it will be seen that many of the figures have been changed in the finance report of 1870, after having been officially reported for many years.

PENSION EXPENDITURES.

In the report of 1870 the expenditures for pensions are stated for the year 1864–'65 at	$16,347,621 34
In the report of 1869 the same expenditures for the same year are stated at	9,291,610 48
Showing an increase in the report of 1870 over the figures in the report of 1869 of	7,056,010 86
In the report of 1870 the pension expenditures for the year 1863–'64 are stated at	4,985,473 90
In the report of 1863–'64 the same expenditures for that year (1863–'64) are stated at	4,979,633 17
Showing an increase in the report of 1870 over the figures stated in the report of 1869 of	5,840 73
In the report of 1870 the expenditures for pensions in the year 1870 are stated at	28,340,202 17
In the report of 1874 the same expenditures for the same year (1870) are stated at	28,402,241 20
Showing an increase in the report of 1874 over 1870 of	62,039 03

NAVAL EXPENDITURES.

In the finance report for 1871 the expenditures in the Naval Department are put down for the year 1865 at	122,617,431 07
In the report for 1869 these same expenditures are stated for the same year at	122,567,776 12
Showing an increase in the report of 1871 over the report of 1869 in the naval expenditures for the year 1865 of	49,657 95

WAR DEPARTMENT.

In the report of 1871 the expenditures of the War Department are put down in the annual statement of Government expenditures for the year 1862-'63 at	603,314,411 82
In the report of 1869 the same expenditures for the same year, as appears in the annual statement of expenditures, is stated at	$599,298,600 83
Showing an increase in the figures of the report of 1871 over the report of 1869 for the year 1863 of	4,015,800 99

EXPENDITURES IN INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

In the report for the year 1870 the expenses in the Indian Department for the year 1863 are reported in the statement of annual expenditures at	3,152,032 70
While in the report for the year 1868 these same expenses are reported for the same year at	1,076,326 35
Showing an increase in the figures of the report of 1870 over the report of 1868 in the Indian expenditures for the same year of	2,075,706 35

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator, as a matter of explanation, whether the errors he now points out consist of discrepant repetitions of the same expenditures?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the Senator to state that by the official accounts of the Treasury he finds that an amount is stated for one year at such a sum, and then when the same account for the same year is to be recited it is recited differently, and these are the discrepancies he is pointing out.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Delaware is correct. What I am now endeavoring to point out is that the reports made previous to 1870 especially, and the reports made subsequently to that time do not agree. There appear to have been changes after the figures had been given to the public, in some cases for eight or ten years. These changes occur in the official reports that succeed 1870, and in some cases come down even as far as 1874, as in a case I have just cited.

I come next to the discrepancies in the statements of revenue collected.

REVENUE COLLECTED.

In the finance report for 1863, in the annual statement of revenue collected for that year, we find the internal revenue stated at	$37,640,787 95
The total revenue, exclusive of loans and treasury notes, at	132,889,746 95
And the total receipts from all sources stated for the same year at	889,379,652 52
Now, in the report of 1864 for the same year the internal revenue is stated at the same figures	37,640,787 95
Total revenue, exclusive of loans and treasury notes, at	112,687,290 95
And the total receipts from all sources at	889,379,652 52

That is to say, the Treasury Department makes the total receipts the same, although there is a wide difference in the amount of the total revenue, exclusive of loans and treasury notes.

And in the report of 1870 of the annual statement of revenue collected for the year 1863 we find that no internal revenue is stated as having been collected during that year whatever, and the total receipts, exclusive of loans and treasury notes, at $74,448,157.55, and the total receipts from all sources, $889,373,652.51; showing that in the year 1863, although no internal revenue appears in the report for that year, and the net revenue is stated at a less sum by more than $30,000,000, yet the total receipts from all sources, as in the report of 1863 and 1864, is nearly the same, $889,373,652.51.

Now, it seems to me that large amounts are increased and decreased, as occasion may require in the annual statements, under the head of loans and treasury notes. When a sum is required to make the total receipts agree as to the same year, it is added to or subtracted from "loans and treasury notes," as the case may be.

The loans and treasury notes for the year 1863 are stated as follows in the various finance reports of the annual statements of revenue collected:

In the report of 1863	$756,489,905 57
In the report of 1864	776,682,361 57
In the report of 1870	814,925,494 96

In these reports, in order to make the grand total, or total receipts from all sources, the same for the year 1863, it became necessary to add to the "loans and treasury notes," which seems to be the column in which to merge all differences, increase or decrease all amounts, so as to make the balances the same, no matter what changes and manipulations may have been made under other heads, and, if there be errors or frauds, giving an opportunity to attempt to cover them up under that head.

I have cited these differences in the reports as to the year 1863 to show how glaring they appear and how irregular the system of bookkeeping and statement of accounts has been in the Treasury Department, for I am aware that the greater portion of this amount re-appears in later reports, but I feel very certain that there are other changes, and especially those I have referred to, which cannot be so satisfactorily explained.

If Senators will take the trouble they will find many more instances of changes of figures in the finance reports of revenue collected from different sources after they had been reported for several years, and particularly the years commencing with 1860 and ending with 1872. But the greatest changes in the figures in the finance reports seem to have been in the annual statements of the public debt, my attention having been first called to them by the able senior Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON;] and I will now refer to them.

But before doing so, I desire to state that, in the comparisons just made as to receipts and expenditures, I have taken the figures from the Register's reports in the various finance reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I find that up to 1870 the Register is the only officer that incorporated in his report statements and tables showing the annual revenue collected, annual expenditures, and public debt from the organization of the Government. In the year 1870, and following up to the present time, it seems that, accompanying the Secretary's report in each of the finance reports, these same tables are to be found, giving an annual statement of the revenue collected, expenditures, and public debt, notwithstanding the Register, whose official duty it is, continues these same tables in his report.

These tables and statements accompanying the Secretary's report, and, commencing in the finance report of 1870, differ from the Register's tables in many respects, but seem to be copies of them, except as to the public debt; and here the differences in figures are the most marked.

How these tables have been made, from what sources, and the necessity for them, I have been unable to ascertain, because to make these annual statements and tables seems to have been the official duty of the Register, and they have always been found in his reports.

CHANGES IN THE PUBLIC-DEBT STATEMENT.

By examining the Register's reports for 1870 and 1871, it will be seen that great changes have been made in the statement of the public debt, particularly for the years between 1862 and 1870, inclusive. For instance, in the report of 1871 the statement of the public debt is, commencing with the year 1862, as follows:

1862	$524,176,412 13
1863	1,119,772,138 63
1864	1,815,784,370 57
1865	2,680,647,869 74
1866	2,773,236,173 69
1867	2,678,126,103 87
1868	2,611,687,851 19
1869	2,588,452,213 94
1870	2,480,672,427 81
Total	19,272,555,561 57

In the report for 1871 for the same years the public debt is stated as follows:

1862	$514,211,371 92
1863	1,098,793,181 37
1864	1,740,690,489 49
1865	2,682,593,026 53
1866	2,783,425,879 21
1867	2,692,199,215 12
1868	2,636,320,964 67
1869	2,489,002,480 58
1870	2,386,358,599 74
Total	19,023,595,208 63
Difference, or increase	248,960,352 94

From the above nine years it will be seen that in the report of 1871 the public debt for the years named is increased over the same years in the report of 1870, in the aggregate, $248,960,352.94; and that in the single year of 1870 the report of 1871 increases the public debt over the report of 1870 for that year over $94,000,000 and for the year 1869 over $99,000,000; and for the year 1864 the increase is more than $75,000,000 and for the year 1863 more than $21,000,000.

In the report of 1871 the years in which the public debt is increased over the report of 1870 are—

1863	1,119,772,138 63
1864	1,815,784,370 57
1869	2,588,452,213 94
1870	2,480,672,427 81
Total	8,528,857,563 08

In the report of 1870 these same years are put down as follows:

1862	$514,211,371 92
1863	1,098,793,181 37
1864	1,740,690,489 49
1869	2,489,002,480 54
1870	2,386,358,599 74
Total	8,229,056,123 06

Showing an aggregate increase in these years of $299,801,440.02.

In the report of 1871 the years in which the public debt is decreased, as compared with the report of 1870, are—

1867	2,678,126,103 87
1868	2,611,687,851 19
Total	8,063,050,128 75

In the report of 1870 these same years are stated—

1866	$7,283,425,879 21
1867	2,692,199,215 12
1868	2,636,320,964 67
Total	8,111,946,059 00

Showing the aggregate decrease in these years to be $48,895,930.25.

The aggregate increase in the other years named has been ascertained to be $299,801,440.02.

There are a few other years in which the figures have been changed, but these changes, when compared with those just stated, are so slight as to amounts that they will not materially affect the aggregate increase ascertained.

In the finance report for 1874 the public debt is stated for the years—

1872	$2,253,251,078 78
1873	2,234,482,743 20
Decrease for that year	18,768,335 58

On page 5 of the finance report for 1873 the Secretary says the decrease for that year was $43,667,630.05, making a difference of $24,899,324.47.

In the finance report for 1874 the public debt for 1874 is stated at	$2,251,690,218 43
In the same report the public debt for 1873 is stated at	2,234,482,743 20
Increase, according to these figures, in 1874 over 1873	17,207,475 23

These figures are from the Register's report of 1874, page 496. The Secretary's new table, page 9, differs very slightly from the above. It will be seen by this statement that the debt has increased over seventeen millions between 1873 and 1874, instead of decreased, as claimed. It is true that there is a foot-note explaining this, but it is my opinion that if the debt is actually decreased the figures and annual statements should show it without necessity of explanation of any kind.

It seems that the new table or annual statement of the public debt from 1789 accompanying the Secretary's report, which made its first appearance with the report of 1870, as I have before stated, makes the public-debt statement agree, but the figures and statements seem to be arbitrary, because they not only differ from the tables and statement of the public debt put down in the Register's tables from 1870 to 1875, but also from the tables preceding 1870.

These new tables change materially the public-debt statement, as put down by the Register for the year 1869 and before. Congress and the country, until 1870, took the tables and statements of the public debt of the Register to be entirely correct from the organization of the Government. They could not do otherwise; they had no other information, and no doubt all confidence was placed in them; but now we see this new table accompanying the report of the Secretary for 1870, and succeeding reports, changes the figures reported by the Register before 1870, and does not agree as to the statement of the public debt with the Register since. For instance, in the Register's report of the public debt for the year 1863 it is stated at $1,098,793,181.37; and in the new table of the Secretary, in the finance report for 1870, page 13, the public debt for the same year is put down at $1,119,772,138.63, showing a great difference and an increase of over $20,000,000.

This is one of many changes. Now, by what authority did the Secretary of the Treasury, in his new table in 1870, go back and change the Register's report for that year, which had been reported, taken, and accepted for years as an undisputed fact? But this is not all.

In the finance report for 1862, Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, at pages 2 and 44 of his report, states the public debt on July 1 of that year at $514,211,371.92. The Register in his table, at page 213 of same report, records the public debt for the same year at the same figures; and this stood on the books, with no other contradicting report, until 1870, a period of eight years, and must have been relied on as accurate, when the Secretary, in the new table of the statement of the public debt, for some reason that I cannot understand, states the public debt for the same year, 1862, at $524,176,412.43, showing an increase of near $10,000,000.

Here this new table stands impeached by both Mr. Chase and the Register.

Then, Mr. President, my position, reduced down and expressed more clearly, is this: That the books, figures, and annual statements of the Treasury Department, after having been reported to Congress for a number of years, have been changed; at times decreased, but generally increased, as to amounts. I am aware that it is claimed that headings and foot-notes explain some of the changes by stating that some of the annual statements are made up from "warrants paid," and others from "warrants issued," &c.; but why not continue one system, so that when the receipts and expenditures are determined they can be relied on? Why change from one plan of keeping the books and making statements to another? If you allow an expert to change the manner of stating accounts or statements of magnitude, he can produce results to suit objects in view. And no matter if these officers have different systems of book-keeping, there can be no satisfactory way in which to explain or answer why official reports made to Congress and published to the country, and repeated year after year—reports upon which Congress, the people, and the public creditors relied and acted—should years afterward be changed in the manner I have shown. For example, how is it that the Register of the Treasury in his official report for 1864 states the public debt for that year at $1,740,690,489.49, the total expenditures at $1,298,144,656, the total receipts at $1,385,758,614.58, and these sums remain of record in the Treasury Department as fixed and determined for years, and until 1870, and are accepted as correct, there being no other source of information; and then the Secretary, in the finance report of 1870, goes back and states for the same year, 1864, different sums entirely; as, for instance: Public debt, $1,815,784,370.57; total expenditures, $1,295,541,114.86; total receipts, $1,393,461,017.57? If the amounts determined in 1864 were correct they should remain so, and no power should change them. It is a remarkable fact that the different Secretaries' and Registers' reports previous to 1860 substantially agreed, after which year the difference amounts to many millions in a single year.

I am aware there may and ought to be made some explanation as to these changes and differences; but this explanation, whatever it may be, must and will bring to light why, by what authority, and what necessity induced the change of figures I have cited, and many more not referred to, that exist in the books and statements, and no doubt the willing aid of the officers of the Treasury Department will be given to any Senator who may think my remarks worthy of reply.

The figures and changes I have referred to in official reports are so very large and the amounts so enormous that I can hardly believe them myself, but after careful and earnest examination of the facts in reference thereto, and such information as I could obtain after consultation with different officers of the Treasury Department, I am forced to declare that I can find no satisfactory explanation of them. If there is one, I should be glad to have it. If there is a Senator upon this floor, or an officer of the Government, who can make plain and satisfactory explanation of these changes and discrepancies, I hope he will lose no time in making himself heard; for, in my judgment, if it is incapable of explanation it is more dangerous than any default, no matter what the amount.

In the face of the above comparisons, the conclusion cannot be avoided that the official statements of the Treasury Department have been changed, especially in the report of 1870, from former reports as to the "revenue collected" and "expenditures," and in the report of 1871 from former reports as to the public debt, these changes involving large amounts, for some object that is not apparent upon their face. This power to go back and change figures and entries on the books, which have been ascertained and reported for years and been the subject of official and public confidence, has not been conferred upon any officer or set of officers in the Government service, and, in my judgment, cannot be. If it should be, however, it would be a dangerous innovation, destroying all confidence and certainty in the financial affairs of the Government. If these changes and alterations are permitted to be made and to pass unnoticed, what safety has the Government as to the public funds, and what value can be attached to statements in reference thereto? If the principle be acknowledged as a correct one, that an officer or set of officers can change the books of the Treasury Department, either to increase or decrease them for any cause, even for a single penny, they can do it for tens of millions, as has been the case, and instantly there ceases to be a proper check or safeguard thrown around the funds or records of the Government.

The largest railroad corporations, commercial and manufacturing establishments in the country, whose accounts reach tens of millions, when managed upon proper business principles, have no difficulty in making intelligible their books and being able to make a statement of the exact condition of their business at any time. And while I concede that the Government is on a larger scale, yet its management should be such that its financial affairs may be readily understood; and, indeed, the larger the operations the greater the necessity for rigid, prompt, and accurate accountability, and careful and regular statements, which should always agree and, when once rendered, should be, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, not subject to change.

I will here remark, as I notice the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is paying attention, that in one of the reports made by him when he was Secretary of the Treasury he says that the Government is managed on the principle of a business house, though on a much larger scale. That principle I agree to; and, therefore, I have been unable to find out why such great discrepancies occur in the reports of the different years.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to ask the Senator from West Virginia if there is no note or word of explanation of such discrepancies?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, there are in some instances, as I have stated, foot-notes and headings which state in effect that some of the years have been made up from warrants issued and others from warrants paid. There are a few explanations noted in the annual statement of the public debt, but they will not explain the discrepancies I have pointed out in the years named; but I am unable to see how any system of book-keeping can change amounts after they have been once officially determined and reported to Congress. I have no objection to any question whatever upon this subject, for every figure that I have used and every change that I have referred to is of official record and taken from the official reports.

It will be recollected that the able chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SHERMAN] said in debate the other day, while reading from one of the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and referring to a monthly statement of the public debt made by that officer: "We have a statement of the public debt made under the highest sanctionof law, made under the oaths of many officers. * * * Do you pretend to say that document is not true? It is the strangest thing in the world that Senators should make such an assertion. There it is, and this statement gives the interest accrued up to the time that it was made and published, and no one has ever questioned the accuracy of this statement." I have not referred to nor have I examined the report my distinguished friend from Ohio read from, but from his statement he certainly had great confidence in the accuracy of reports and statements of the Treasury Department; but I submit now, in face of the facts I have shown from other finance reports, ought any one to place full confidence in these statements as to the transactions of the financial affairs of Government?

I have no suitable words to express my condemnation of anything that looks like a change in the books and statements of the Departments of the Government, and there is no escape from the fact that changes in the books and statements of the Treasury Department have been made. In all private corporations, banks, and commercial establishments, it is an established fact that the first step toward criminality and defalcation on the part of their officers and servants is to tamper with, manipulate, and change the books. Could or would any confidence be placed in any banking institution or corporation in the country if it could be shown that its books and annual statements, from time to time, had been changed, and the figures and entries did not agree with each other in the different departments of their business? Certainly no one would or ought to trust such an institution or individual; and how much more important is it to avoid anything of the kind on the part of the Government. The facts and figures stated justify, in my opinion, the appointment of a special committee of the Senate to look into the changes in and the condition of the books and accounts of the Treasury Department; and I therefore ask the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I have been a good deal attracted by the observations made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia toward the conclusion of his remarks upon the moral aspect of the business of accounting, and indeed I have thought it rather surpassed the intellectual presentation of the case.

There is nothing new in the statements made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia. As to the figures presented, drawn from the reports of the Treasury Department, I have no observation to make. I venture to say, however, that an accurate knowledge of the business of the Treasury Department will dissipate all the difficulties under which the honorable Senator from West Virginia now labors; and it occurs to me that in his position as a Senator, dealing with a great public question, as he evidently thinks he is, it might have been well to have called upon the present Secretary of the Treasury, who has very little interest in the transactions that are now under consideration here, and have unfolded to him these difficulties, and asked him whether or not they were capable of a fair solution. I know not but that that course has been taken; but I am quite sure that it was in the power of the head of that Department, and I am equally sure that it would have been in his disposition, to have given to any member of this body an opportunity for understanding all the difficulties to which the honorable Senator from West Virginia has referred.

It is one of the chief objects in a great system of accounting to be able to test the truthfulness of the statements that appear upon the record; and incidentally I make this observation, that nothing which the honorable Senator from West Virginia has presented this morning goes at all to the point that the books of the Treasury Department have been tampered with or changed by anybody.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether I am to understand him as saying that the books have not been changed, or the statements?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The statements that are presented to Congress and to the country are different statements, but they are statements prepared for the very purpose of enabling any person who chooses to investigate the affairs of the Treasury Department to ascertain whether those statements concur when they are analyzed and the material of which they are composed are ascertained.

Mr. DAVIS. I have stated that the figures in the different reports did not correspond. I ask the Senator, and I would thank him for a direct answer, whether or not I am to understand him as saying that the figures as reported to Congress and the country in the official reports sent to us year after year have not been changed?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Have or have not been changed?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The different statements are different, but what I mean to say is that the books of the Treasury Department, which the honorable Senator from West Virginia distinctly asserted had been changed, have not been changed. The statements to which the honorable Senator has referred are different statements, some of them made by the Secretary of the Treasury and representing that branch of the business which is specially under his control, the other statements drawn from the reports of the Register of the Treasury and representing upon the basis on which his accounts are kept the business under his control; and it is possible and easy for an accountant to take these separate statements and, by pursuing them to the bases on which they rest, ascertain whether they are true or not.

Mr. DAVIS. May I asked the honorable Senator whether or not the statements of the public debt or of the revenues or the expenditures, it is immaterial which, previous to 1869 or 1870, and subsequent to 1870, as reported to Congress, agree in figures?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Agree in figures! No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Then do I understand that the reports previous to 1870 and subsequent to 1870 are different? In other words, do I understand that in 1870 the figures of the expenditures of the Government for 1862, previously reported at so many millions, had been changed and raised to a higher figure?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, that is the case according to the official reports. I do not know that it is the fact, but I took the figures from the reports.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I shall be obliged, Mr. President, against my disposition, to say something of myself—a most unwelcome subject, and more unwelcome to everybody else. When I took charge of the Treasury Department in 1869, one of the first things I discovered was that the books of the Department did not represent the actual amount of the public debt outstanding, as we knew it to be; that is to say, that the loan account could not be balanced when on the debit side was placed the amount of the debt outstanding; and this arose from a succession of events commencing with the very inauguration of the Treasury Department under Mr. Hamilton. The General Government assumed of the debts of the States the sum of $76,000,000, which was not represented by anything in the Treasury. No money was received into the Treasury of the United States for the $76;000,000. A loan account was opened. The debt when it became due was paid. The loan account was debited with the payment; but there was no credit upon the credit side because nothing had been entered. It had been an assumption of the indebtedness of the various States, to which were added smaller sums, making an aggregate of $76,000,000. Following that there were various transactions by the Government which increased this apparent discrepancy to the extent of $116,000,000. Of these I may mention the indemnity to Texas, for which there was nothing upon the books of the Department in the nature of a credit to set off the debit when the bonds were due.

Again, in 1861, Mr. Chase was authorized to make a loan which is now called the loan of 1881, the twenty-year loan, at a rate of interest not exceeding 7 per cent. Bonds were prepared at 6 per cent. When he came to negotiate these bonds he found he could not negotiate them at par at less than 7 per cent. The consequence was, and Mr. Chase explained it all in his report to Congress in the year 1861, that he was obliged to put accountants to work to ascertain the present value of a 6 per cent. bond payable twenty years hence, at the rate of 7 per cent. interest. The consequence was that he issued $50,000,000 bonds which bore upon their face 6 per cent. interest, on which he actually paid 7 per cent., and of course received into the Treasury something more than $45,000,000, but less than $46,000,000, for $50,000,000 of bonds. The consequence was that upon the credit side of the loan account there was to be entered only the amount of money received for these bonds, and not the amount which the bonds themselves represented.

There were various transactions of that sort from the beginning of the Government, and I found that there was a discrepancy of $116,000,000. A portion of the accounts of the Government from the beginning in regard to the receipts and expenditures in cash had been examined, but not thoroughly. We commenced an examination of these accounts to ascertain whether the cash receipts and expenditures of the Government could be balanced, and we found in the end that they could be balanced exactly to a cent from the beginning of the Government. There was nothing which could be traced in the Treasury in money which could not be accounted for. This was a considerable work, but nevertheless it was accomplished in the year 1870.

We commenced the pursuit of the various items making up the aggregate of $116,000,000, and most of them have been traced out so that the explanation is perfectly clear. I do not know but that at the present time all of them have been disposed of; but Congress was from time to time informed of this proceeding and of the success of the undertaking.

Then, up to 1869, the Register had kept the account of the debt of the United States, as by law he was required to do. No account of it had ever been kept in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in a certain sense, therefore, there were no present checks upon the accounts of the Register. To be sure, the books of the Department furnished the means by which the statements made by the Register could be substantiated or invalidated, but there were no present means at hand by which the accuracy of the reports made by the Register of the Treasury could be established.

I do not know how I shall be able to suggest to the honorable Senator from West Virginia an explanation of the business of the Treasury Department in these particulars; but I suppose he may comprehend very easily that if a railway agent at a particular station has deposited with him tickets to be sold having a certain value and he should be called upon to account to the managers of the railroad for the value of those tickets and they should demand of him the cash representing them, he might very well say "I have not the cash on hand that represents the amount of these tickets, because I have sent by the messenger this morning to headquarters a pocket-book containing money which was a portion of the receipts from the sale of these tickets; I have other tickets on hand;" and therefore it would follow that if you went to headquarters to know the amount of the indebtedness of this railroad agent to the corporation it would be impossible to ascertain it in equity. There would be upon the books of the establishment an appearance of truth but not the truth itself.

It is only by exploring, by understanding, by investigation, or by knowledge derived from practical experience that you are able to test a system of accounting. If you were to go to a bank to ascertain the balance to the credit of any depositor and were to go to the depositor's own books, the probability is that they would be different. They might agree, but if the depositor were a man doing an active business they would certainly differ. But it is quite apparent that when you have the books of the bank, when you have the books of the depositor, and when you ascertain the checks outstanding, you can arrive at the truth.

Now, then, the business of the Register of the Treasury in reference to the public debt is this: he keeps an account on the credit side of all the issues of obligations by the Government, whether bonds or United States notes, or any other form of evidence of public indebtedness. He keeps also an account upon the debit side of the payments made for the redemption of these various securities; and the difference between the two sides of the ledger shows the amount of public indebtedness. That was the account kept by the Register of the Treasury from the beginning of the Government until now. It is, so far as I know, a true account. It has not come to my knowledge, and it will never, I think, come to the knowledge of the honorable Senator from West Virginia, that those figures have by anybody, either with or without official authority, been changed; but they do not state the exact truth. When large operations were carried on by the Government and loans were making at the rate of many hundred million dollars a year, these accounts of indebtedness of the Government were very far from the actual truth; but nevertheless they contained the means by which any competent person could ascertain what the truth was, and they stand so to-day. No suggestions that they differ from other accounts from the Treasury Department will invalidate in the least the statement I make.

But consider the processes. Suppose that there is an opportunity to negotiate a loan of $10,000,000. Bonds are printed. They pass through the loan division; they are delivered to the Register of the Treasury; he signs those bonds as Register of the Treasury, and immediately he credits the amount of the public debt with the par value of those bonds; and if at that moment you go to the Register's Office and ask for the public debt of the United States, it stands really $10,000,000 more than it is. So, on the other hand, the Treasurer of the United States may at the same moment, or at a corresponding period of time, have redeemed a portion of the public debt. It has been paid. He has credited himself with the amount he has so paid upon the books of the Treasurer's Office; but before he can be allowed finally for that item the bonds, with the evidence of their payment, must pass through the First Auditor's Office and the First Comptroller's Office of the Treasury; and days, even weeks, may elapse before those bonds reach the Register's Office canceled and in condition for him to debit the public debt account of the country so as to show exactly the effect of that transaction. So, then, it would happen that the debt of the country might appear larger, probably would appear larger at the Register's Office at any moment of time than it actually was.

These accounts, so far as this particular transaction is concerned, have not been changed. But what was done? In 1869 and 1870, when we found that there was no present means of checking the accounts of the Register of the Treasury, we instituted a public-debt account in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and we went back. It might not have been necessary, but we thought it expedient to ascertain, upon the basis on which the accounts are kept in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, the debt of the United States at various periods of time; and in 1870 a statement was published of the debt of the United States at various periods of time, made up from the records in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury the public debt is credited with the receipts when they are actually paid in and a warrant is drawn covering the receipts into the Treasury, and the public-debt account is debited with payments on account of the public debt when warrants are issued for the payment of the public debt. The consequence is that at any particular moment of time the apparent debt of the Government as represented in the Register's Office and as represented in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury will be different. But when you have these two statements, different as they are, you have the means of following out the items which are included in one statement and excluded from the other, just exactly as you can ascertain the actual balance to a depositor in a bank when you have the books of the bank and the books of the depositor and know the amount of outstanding checks not paid. And therefore this system, of which so much complaint is made now, was instituted in 1869 and 1870 as a check upon the Register's Office and for the purpose of enabling the Senator from West Virginia to ascertain whether the accounts of the Treasury were accurate or not.

This statement explains in a general way, because I do not propose to go into the details, these differences. Whether his figures are right or wrong I cannot say, but I admit that there are differences. They are differences inherent in the business of accounting; differences which, if they did not exist, would show collusion and fraud between the different branches of the Treasury Department.

There are some other differences in the Register's statements of receipts and expenditures which explain another class of difficulties to which the honorable Senator from West Virginia has referred. The accounts in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, as I have said, are kept by warrants; that is, when money is covered into the Treasury, not always when it is actually in the Treasury, (because sometimes there are moneys in the Treasury that are not covered into the Treasury, because for the moment it cannot be ascertained to what account they should be sent,) there are others that are in the nature of special deposits, that are the property of somebody else, or possibly may be the property of somebody else, and, if covered into the Treasury, could not be taken out without a warrant; and therefore there are always, I suppose, moneys actually in the Treasury that have not been covered in by warrants.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the time of McCulloch there was more than $15,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. More than $15,000,000, of which many gentlemen in the South enjoyed the benefit. I have said that the accounts in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury are kept by warrants. When the Treasurer settles his accounts, once in three months, he claims credit for the warrants that have been issued; as, for example, a paymaster may get a warrant for $20,000; there may be drafts against that draft; the Treasurer will claim for the entire amount of that warrant; but when his accounts are settled once in three months he is allowed by the Auditor and Comptroller not the amount of those warrants, but the amount of drafts drawn under those respective warrants which have been actually paid; and the difference is set off against him. The Register makes up his account, not upon the nominal value of the warrant, but upon the amount that has been actually paid upon it.

Now, it does happen that when the fiscal year approaches its closing warrants are adjusted at the office of the Register against which there are outstanding drafts, and the Treasurer is not allowed of course for drafts which he has not met. Those drafts represent expenses incurred perhaps in the year just then closing; possibly they may represent expenses that should be charged against the appropriations of a preceding year, or even the one before that, as my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] suggests. These drafts ultimately are paid, sometimes in a year; often persons thinking them most excellent property, not caring to use the money, keep them in their pockets, others are lost for a period of time and recovered; but finally, when they are presented to the Department and paid and the Treasurer is allowed for the payment of them, the Register of the Treasury does go back and assign these drafts so paid to the expenses of the current year against which the drafts were drawn, as he is bound to do by law, I think, although I am not sure as to that; but I know it is the universal practice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the law. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The consequence is that, if you look this year at the expenses as reported by the Register of the Treasury for the current year, next year very likely the items will be changed; and that explains another class of difficulties to which the honorable Senator from West Virginia has referred.

Mr. THURMAN. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. How does it come that precisely the same amounts in regard to both expenditures and receipts for a particular year were repeated year after year, not corrected the next year, but the identical sums to a mill repeated year after year in some instances for four or five years?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The honorable Senator from Ohio is not quite as definite in his question as he should be to enable me to answer it. If he means to say that the statements made by the Register in different years are different as regards particular items of expenditure or receipts in previous years, I should explain that difference in the manner to which I have last called the attention of the Senate; but if the honorable Senator from Ohio refers to the fact that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury as to receipts and expenditures—a report first presented to the Congress in the year 1870—is different in regard to previous years from the report previously presented by the Register of the Treasury, that difference is to be explained by the view that I was taking of the subject some minutes ago.

Mr. THURMAN. If I do not interrupt the Senator I will say that that is not the point. Why is it that these reports of previous years corresponded; that it was reported, for instance, in 1862-'63 that the expenditures were so much; that in the report of 1864 the expenses of 1862-'63 were put down at precisely the same amount; that the same thing was repeated in 1864-'65; and so on, until we come to the report of 1870?

Mr. BOUTWELL. But it is not the Register's report of 1870 that was different from the Register's report of 1864; but it is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made up, as I have before stated, from the warrant account both of receipts and expenditures—not from the report of the Register.

Mr. DAVIS. My understanding is, I will say to the Senator, that the Register's and the Secretary's tables differ. For instance, as the Senator from Ohio has said, take 1860; the accounts run along agreeing substantially up to 1870, and then there is a large change, not only as to 1860, but as to all the different years from that time. The amount reported by the Register has also been changed, as well as the amount reported by the Secretary. While I am up I will say further that I am at a loss to know how the Secretary's table was made up, as I understand the Register's Office is the final resting-place of all warrants, and from the warrants he makes up his statement.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have already said that there were exceptions. The Register does not make up his statement from warrants; he makes up his statement from warrants so far as the warrants have been met by drafts paid; but he does not allow the Treasurer of the United States a credit on account of a warrant to which the Treasurer has not responded.

I understood the honorable Senator from West Virginia to refer to a discrepancy in the statements of the public debt. The explanation which I have already made in regard to the mode of keeping accounts in the office of the Register of the Treasury and the mode of keeping accounts in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury will explain the difference between the statement as to the amount of the public debt at a particular time by the Register and the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury, because they proceed upon a different basis, as I have already explained; but an analysis of the two statements will never fail to show that the facts on which they are based are the same.

Some persons have been led into an error in regard to the public-debt statement as it appears finally in the financial report submitted to Congress in December, and the monthly statement made on the 1st of July, which is understood to be the close of the financial year. Those differences arise from two circumstances. In the first place, the financial report that is made to Congress in the month of December represents the financial condition of the country at the close of business on the 30th day of June. The monthly statement given to the public is given on the 1st day of July. Oftentimes, generally you may say, there are receipts and expenditures that day which affect the statement, and which account for any difference there may be between the monthly statement of the 1st of July and the annual statement made to Congress as of the close of business on the 30th day of June.

Then another difference exists in this: The statement made to Congress, according to law, of the public debt covers only the principal of the public debt; the monthly statements made on the first day of each month since April, 1869, include also, as a part of the public debt, the interest earned up to the day the statement is made. That interest is included as a part of the public debt, because it is an item for which the Government is as much liable as it is for the principal of the public debt. These explanations account for all the differences that have been found in the various statements concerning the public debt.

I noticed that the honorable Senator from West Virginia referred to what he thought was an error in a change made in the pension account of a particular year, 1863 perhaps. I have not had time since his statement to go over the account to ascertain what the truth is; but I have no doubt as to the accuracy of the explanation I now make. If he will examine the account of that year, the year when the pension account appears to be the largest, he will find that the heading is "on account of pensions, including trust funds." In one of those years about $7,000,000 were derived from prizes, or from some other returns of naval undertakings. That had been carried to the pension account in the Treasury Department at a time when Congress by legislation provided that these sums of money which had been so accumulated in the Treasury Department should be set aside and invested as a fund for naval pensions. You see in the account $14,000,000 outstanding liability of the Government, the income of which is appropriated to naval pensions. It so happened that year that when the money was transferred a charge was made on the pension account of about $7,000,000, which was paid into this permanent fund; but nevertheless it appeared for the time as a payment on account of pensions. Afterward the two items were separated, and the actual amount paid for pensions was less than had appeared in a previous statement.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The statement I made as to pensions was, that in 1865, the expenditures for pensions are put down at $9,000,000, in round numbers. It so ran along in the annual statements until 1870 or 1871—I forget which, for I have not the figures before me—and it then changed from $9,000,000 to $16,000,000. This amount, which was reported for several years at $9,000,000 as the pension expenditure for 1865, is altered and changed in the reports and tables made since 1870 to $16,000,000. Now, if it had been $16,000,000 in 1865, and had afterward been transferred, put into some other fund, then I could see very well how it would be reduced, but I cannot see how it should be increased for the same year.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Whether the Senator fron West Virginia is right or I am right, the $7,000,000 to which he refers was derived from prize-money or the result of naval operations, credited for a time to the pension account and afterward transferred. There was a time when it was charged to the pension account, although as a matter of fact it was merely a transfer to the pensions of a sum of money from one account to another. No pensions were paid out of it at the time, but the $7,000,000 became a part of the $14,000,000 which the Government now holds and on which it pays 3 or 4 per cent. interest for the benefit of naval pensions. That is the explanation of that transaction.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator recollect that there were three or four different items in different reports? It was not one particular item as he would infer, but these changes occur in the accounts of the Indian Department, the War and the Navy, as well as in regard to pensions.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator will find that they are all traceable to the same fact, the trust funds, which were held for a time and placed to a particular account, and afterward transferred from that account, as the officers by law were required to do. I did not observe whether the honorable Senator referred to any other matter in connection with the Treasury than those I have already noticed or not.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, Mr. President, I referred to several others, although I do not wish to annoy the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. DAVIS. If I do I will not ask any further question or attempt to refresh his memory in regard to what I said.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, Mr. President, the revenue collected for several years has been changed, in a few instances increased, but generally decreased. For instance, the receipts into the Treasury, after having been reported at a given amount for five or six years, have been changed. In some instances they have been increased to a limited amount, but they have been generally decreased, I believe. I cited one notable case which was afterward explained. But the point in that was that when the $37,000,000 was dropped, the column which contains "Treasury notes and loans" was increased to make the total amount come out right; and so when it was put back that same column of "Treasury notes and loans" was decreased to get in the $37,000,000 again. In that year, 1863, dropping the $37,000,000, calling that only irregular—because I am ready to admit there was an error somewhere—there are one or two millions, my recollection is, which are unaccounted for. In other words, after a number of years have passed, the amount of receipts of revenue for 1863 has been decreased to the extent, according to my recollection, of perhaps one or two million dollars.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no idea that there has been any change which cannot be explained, and I think the statement I have made probably explains the particular matter to which the honorable Senator refers. In regard to the difference in the statements of the receipts and expenditures for a particular year, there will always be a difference, arising from the fact that on the 30th of June, when the fiscal year closes, a statement is made of the amount of money received into the Treasury during that year; but that statement represents only the amount of money of which official knowledge has reached the office of the Secretary of the Treasury here. The books are kept open for forty-five days for the purpose of receiving returns from all parts of the country where payments have been made. The consequence is that at the end of forty-five days the receipts are usually considerably larger than they were on the 30th of June. This is particularly true in regard to the Internal Revenue Office. The Internal Revenue Office keeps an account of its annual receipts and they are published, but those receipts represent the amounts of money paid of which evidence reaches the Internal Revenue Commissioner between the 1st day of July of one year and the 30th day of June of the succeeding year. Those receipts in part are of moneys actually collected and paid in to the designated depositaries previous to the 1st day of July. At the commencement of the year, that is, in 1875, for example, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on the 1st day of July, will say that he has received a certain sum of revenue, $300,000, for example; but it is revenue paid into the Treasury actually the preceding fiscal year. Now, then, when he comes to the close of the year he closes his account on the night of the 30th of June, but for days and weeks afterward he will be receiving certificates, vouchers of deposits of revenue actually collected by the officers of the Government and paid into the Treasury previous to the 1st day of July.

Mr. THURMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. But let whatever system be adopted of keeping the books which show the amount of receipts for a particular year, when you have followed that system and settled upon the amount for that particular year, then there ought to be no alteration in the statement of that account in the subsequent reports.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There has been no alteration.

Mr. THURMAN. There have certainly been alterations. I do not say there have been alterations on the books, but the fact was stated by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is only because in 1870 a statement was made, which has been continued from year to year, of the state of the finances as represented by the books in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and previous thereto and since that time there have been statements made by the Register which rest upon different facts, but when the two statements are compared and the facts included in the one and not included in the other are considered, they will agree. That is the truth.

Mr. DAVIS. I can understand very well how the receipts in the manner the Senator from Massachusetts has described can be increased after the 30th of June, but I cannot understand how they can be decreased by revenue coming in. It would certainly increase them and not decrease them; yet this is the case in more than one instance.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not observe any such statement made by the Senator from West Virginia in his remarks submitted to the Senate some time ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will give way, as there are some messages from the President of the United States, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair.) Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. May I ask whether the resolution now pending will be the unfinished business to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As a matter of course if we adjourn upon this question to-day it will be the unfinished business to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at two o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
City Hall, Boston, December 21, 1875.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, the mayor of the city of Boston, in Massachusetts, in compliance with the order of the city council of said city, a copy of which is appended, respectfully petitions your honorable bodies to carry out the resolution adopted by Congress on the 29th of October, 1781, and cause to be erected at Yorktown, in Virginia, a marble column commemorative of the last and crowning battle of the Revolution.

SAML. C. COBB,
Mayor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
City Hall, Boston, June 24, 1875.

To the honorable the City Council:

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from Hon. George Bancroft, a son of Massachusetts, and formerly a citizen of Boston, suggesting the propriety of some action at this time on the part of the city government to redeem the pledge made by Congress on the 29th of October, 1781, to build a monument at Yorktown, Virginia, commemorative of the great victory which secured the recognition of our independence.

I cannot but think that, in the national enthusiasm attending this centennial period, the people of this country will expect Congress to redeem the pledge solemnly given in 1781. And it would seem to be fitting that Boston, as having within its limits the monument commemorating the first pitched battle of the Revolution, at Bunker Hill, should be foremost and earnest in its endeavors to secure the erection of a like memorial of the last and crowning battle at Yorktown, Virginia. The most obvious method would appear to be a petition to Congress, with the expectation that other cities and the whole country will cordially unite with us in such an effort to secure an object so appropriate and desirable. Some action on our part in this direction, whether in the manner proposed or any other, I should regard as a natural sequel to our own recent celebration, in which we had the happiness of uniting fraternally with our fellow-citizens from all sections of the country in commemorating the illustrious deeds of our fathers and theirs a hundred years ago.

I commend the subject to your respectful consideration.

SAMUEL C. COBB,
Mayor.

NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND, June 22, 1875.

MY DEAR MR. MAYOR: The ceremonies for the centennial celebration of the battle of Bunker Hill have been appropriately closed by a solemn and affectionate farewell to the military guests from Virginia. It brings to mind the years when, during the severe trials of Massachusetts, that ancient Commonwealth always and ever at the right moment gave to her sister colony her heartiest and firmest and most needed support, and when the two were bound together by the undying patriotism that springs from the love of freedom and of man.

You have renewed with her representatives the old and intimate union between the States; but the flowers which profusely decorated your streets while they were with you have faded away; your living words of friendship were intrusted to the air; but the memory of what you have done ought to be perpetuated by an enduring monument. The counterpart of the battle of Bunker Hill is found at Yorktown. Our people retired from Bunker Hill after a glorious and effective resistance; the victory at Yorktown, achieved by the united forces of Virginia, New England, and the intermediate States, and our heroic and generous allies, was the signal for the enemy to retire from the unnatural conflict which they had provoked; so that the giving up of the sword of the British commander and the surrender of his army to the great Virginian, the great American, the best representative of his country and his century, was happily the perfected triumph of peace. The one great event was completed by the other. On Bunker Hill you have raised the commemorative column and statues. On the 29th of October, 1781, Congress pledged to the victorious army, to France, to America, to the world, that the nation should build at Yorktown a monument of marble, with emblems of our great alliance, to keep fresh in memory the all-decisive successes which had been achieved.

Let the occasion of your centennial be taken to redeem that pledge, by which you and all of us, every village and every city and every State, are engaged.

Bunker Hill is now within the precincts of Boston. How the Union would respond to your city government if it would request Congress to redeem the public faith by fulfilling the promise of our fathers! A shadow will be thrown over the coming centennial at Yorktown, if, when we meet on that spot, their word shall not yet have been honored.

If I need to offer any apology for addressing you on this occasion, I can only plead that I am a native of Massachusetts; that I was for many years a citizen of Boston; and that of those who were commissioned to speak, whether at the semi-centennial of Bunker Hill battle, or the laying the corner-stone, or the completion of the monument, I (selected, to be sure, only as a reserve) alone remain alive to express what would have been the prayer of them all not less than my own.

I remain, my dear Mr. Mayor, most sincerely yours,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

The MAYOR OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.

IN COMMON COUNCIL, June 24, 1875.

The foregoing message was referred to Messrs. David P. Kimball, Francis H. Peabody, and J. Augustus Felt, with such as the board of aldermen may join. Sent up for concurrence.

IN BOARD OF ALDERMEN, June 28, 1875.

Referred in concurrence, and Aldermen Samuel M. Quincy and Clinton Viles were joined on said committee.

IN BOARD OF ALDERMEN, November 30, 1875.

The joint special committee to whom was referred a communication from his honor the mayor, inclosing a letter from Hon. George Bancroft, suggesting a petition to Congress for the erecting of the promised memorial column at Yorktown, Virginia, having considered the subject, beg leave to submit the following report:

"By reference to the Journals of Congress for that year, it appears that on the 29th of October, 1781, the following action was taken in relation to a commemoration of the important and decisive success of the allied armies at Yorktown.

[Extract from Journal of Congress, October 29, 1781.]

"'On a report of the committee, consisting of Mr. Randolph, Mr. Boudinot, Mr. Varnum, Mr. Carroll, to whom were referred the letters of the 16th and 19th, from General Washington—

"'Resolved, That the United States in Congress assembled will cause to be erected at York, in Virginia, a marble column adorned with emblems of the alliance between the United States and His Most Christian Majesty; and inscribed with a succinct narrative of the surrender of Earl Cornwallis to His Excellency General Washington, commander-in-chief of the combined forces of America and France; to His Excellency the Count de Rochambean, commanding the auxiliary troops of His Most Christian Majesty in America, and His Excellency the Count de Grasse, commanding in chief the naval army of France in the Chesapeake.'"

Your committee are of the opinion that the desirability and appropriateness of an appeal by our city government for the redemption of the foregoing pledge at the present time cannot be better expressed than in the words in which his honor the mayor comments upon the suggestion of the distinguished historian which is referred to us. "It would seem to be fitting," he says, "that Boston, as having within its limits the monument commemorating the first pitched battle of the Revolution, should be foremost and earnest in its endeavors to secure the erection of a like memorial of the last and crowning battle of the Revolution at Yorktown, Virginia." "How the Union would respond to your city government," writes Mr. Bancroft, "if it would request Congress to redeem the public faith by fulfilling the promise of our fathers!" These views being fully shared by your committee, they would respectfully recommend the passage of the accompanying order.

For the committee,

S. M. QUINCY,
Chairman.

Ordered, That his honor the mayor be authorized to petition the National Congress, at its present session, in behalf of the government of the city whose limits now include the first pitched battle-field of the Revolution, for a fulfillment of the pledge given to the world October 29, 1781, for an appropriate commemoration of the last and crowning battle-field of the same Revolution, at Yorktown, Virginia; and that in aid of the petition the assistance of the various city governments of our sister State of Virginia be, and the same hereby is, confidently solicited.

A true copy of order passed by the city council of Boston, December 21, 1875.

Attest:

S. F. MCCLEARY,
City Clerk.

He also entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

WOMEN OF UTAH.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I ask unanimous consent to present a petition, signed by 22,626 women of Utah, asking for the repeal of certain laws, the enactment of others, and the admission of Utah as a State, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

Mr. PAGE. I object to the printing of the memorial, but not to its reference.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. Does the gentleman object to the printing of the memorial without the names?

Mr. PAGE. I do not object to the memorial without the names being printed.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. The memorial is very short. I ask that it be printed, with a statement of the number of names affixed.

There was no objection; and the memorial was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WIDOW OF JAMES J. GIBSON, JR.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to the widow of James J. Gibson, jr., late an employé of the House, a sum equal to his pay for three months, and also pay his proper funeral expenses.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not object to this irregular proceeding of business this morning. But it is so important to the proper conduct of the business of the House that the regular order shall be enforced. I desire to state that I shall have to insist upon the regular order after this morning.

VOTING FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. BENNETT submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

Whereas several propositions for amendments to the Constitution of the United States in relation to the manner of the election of President and Vice-President have been submitted to the House and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in the consideration of such propositions the Committee on the Judiciary be, and hereby is, requested to inquire into the expediency of incorporating into such constitutional amendments a provision granting to the citizens residing in the organized Territories the same privileges of voting for President and Vice-President as may be granted to such citizens residing in the States.

J. R. MAUREAU AND OTHERS.

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1043) for the relief of J. R. Maureau, J. D. Price, Henry Norris, and others; which was read a first and second time, and, with the papers on the subject now on file in the Clerk's office, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to report the following resolution for action at this time:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Patents and the acting chairman of any subcommittee thereof be authorized and empowered to administer oaths when deemed by them necessary in any and all investigations before them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to inquire if that is not the law now?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. A resolution of a similar character was passed in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without examination, it is the opinion of the Chair that the committee possesses that power now.

The resolution was adopted.

MARGARET E. WEST.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1044) granting a pension to Margaret E. West; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL.

Mr. ELY presented the following memorial; which was read, and referred to the Special Committee on the Centennial Celebration:

In the name of justice and honesty we do most solemnly protest against the proposition to tax the women of this Republic in aid of the centennial exhibition of this year. It is proposed that Congress shall pass a bill giving a million and a half of the people's money to an occasion which celebrates the freedom of only one-half of that people. It is admitted that women pay one-third of the whole amount of the revenues of the country, and yet they are to-day suffering under the same slavery which oppressed our ancestors a century ago. They are taxed without representation and governed without their consent. In the face of this flagrant injustice a Republic that calls itself free proposes by its Congress, where not one woman's voice is heard, to impose upon a disfranchised and unrepresented sex the enormous burden of half a million of dollars, to be given to the dominant sex to help them in their rejoicings over a liberty from which these tax-payers are excluded. In plain English, the men of the nation will rob the women of $500,000 in honor of the centennial of our forefathers' great contest against taxation without representation. We indignantly protest against the outrage, in behalf of the New York Woman's Suffrage Society.

INDIAN CONTRACTS.

Mr. COCHRANE submitted the following preamble and resolutions, upon which he called the previous question:

Whereas, on the 27th day of March, 1875, the Department of the Interior, Office of Indian Affairs, solicited proposals for the transportation of Indian goods and supplies; and whereas, in pursuance thereof, divers bids were made for such transportation; and whereas it is alleged that the contract awarded was fraudulently procured and let at prices far in excess of those proposed by other responsible bidders: Now

Be it resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to investigate the letting of such contract and to ascertain and report to the House whether there was fraud in the procuring of the same and the letting thereof, said committee to have power to compell the attendance of witnesses, the production of books and papers, to administer oaths or affirmations, and to do any and all act or acts by said committee deemed necessary for the purpose aforesaid.

Mr. HOAR. I object to the consideration of that resolution, and I think it should be referred to the some committee. After the adoption of the rule that all standing committees might make such investigations, it seems to me we should not authorize special committees for the purpose.

The SPEAKER. When this order of business was entered upon this morning it was done by general consent of the House. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRANE] rose and introduced this resolution he demanded the previous question. It is not now in the power of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] by objection to take this resolution out of the possession of the House.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair for the information of the House. Does the Chair hold that the House cannot hear a resolution read for information, and then determine whether to object or not after hearing it? I think the practice of the House has been otherwise.

The SPEAKER. It is the universal practice of the House whenever it pleases to hear resolutions for information; but where such an understanding is not had, then it is understood that the resolution is received without any condition, especially when it is regularly offered and the previous question is demanded. The Chair therefore overrules the point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. Then we shall have to object to everything for which unanimous consent is asked. I submit, of course, with great deference to the ruling of the Chair; but I am quite sure the practice of the House for many years has been otherwise.

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRANE] allow me a word? I trust that this matter will go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It seems to me that these special committees should not be multiplied in this way.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his demand for the previous question?

Mr. COCHRANE. I deem it proper in many cases that these matters should be submitted to special committees, and not sent to the regular committees of the House. I believe that the matter which this resolution proposes to investigate can be more satisfactorily inquired into by a special committee than by a standing committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his demand for the previous question?

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the gentleman whether the Committee on Indian Affairs is not already pursuing this very investigation?

Mr. COCHRANE. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is in order to move to amend this resolution by substituting the Committee on Indian Affairs for a select committee as the body to make this inquiry. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consent to that. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion cannot be made unless the demand for the previous question be withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the previous question demanded?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow this subject to go to the regular standing committee with these instructions. It is certainly not desirable that we should increase the number of special committees.

Mr. COCHRANE. If instructions be given to the committee to report as speedily as practicable, I have no objection to the reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Several MEMBERS. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair hear any objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions to report on the subject at an early day?

Mr. HOLMAN. Striking out the select committee and inserting the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection; and it is so ordered.

Mr. COCHRANE. I have a bill which I wish to introduce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair a moment ago somewhat misunderstood the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The suggestion, as the Chair now understands, was that the making of this investigation be referred to the standing Committee on Indian Affairs. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

CHARLES GEARING.

Mr. COCHRANE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of Charles Gearing; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.

Mr. DAVY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1046) to provide for a building suitable for the custom-house, post-office, internal-revenue offices, United States courts, and marshal's office at Rochester, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK HEIDELMAN.

Mr. WIKE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1047) for the relief of Frederick Heidelman, late a private in Company F, Forty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM J. POLLOCK.

Mr. FREEMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1048) for the relief of William J. Pollock, late collector of internal revenue of the second district of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS, ETC.

Mr. FREEMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1049) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers and seamen and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF ALL SALARIES TWENTY PER CENT.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1050) to reduce the salaries of public officials receiving more than $1,500 per annum; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to hear that bill read.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the bill be read in full.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the cry of hard times comes from all quarters of our common country, and not without cause; and whereas the honor of this nation and the business interests of this country demand an early resumption of specie payment; and whereas it becomes us as legislators to manifest our faith in economy and reform by adapting ourselves to the depressed condition of affairs: Therefore,

Be it enacted, That the salaries of all public officials whose salaries severally exceed $1,500 per annum be, and the same are hereby, reduced 20 per centum, this act to be in force on and after the 1st day of July, 1876.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire action on this bill at this time?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us take action on it now.

Mr. WHITE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move the reference of the bill to its appropriate committee.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. The subject is before us now, and let us act on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. How does it come before us?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will come to a direct vote on the bill and pass it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the House will refer it to the committee where it appropriately belongs.

Mr. WHITE. I shall demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object to the introduction of the bill?

Mr. BRIGHT. I do.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentlemen's objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to again report the bill, and he hopes the House will give attention, as it is an important measure.

The bill was again read.

Mr. KASSON. In view of the fact that this bill seems to violate in part the Constitution of the United States, I suggest the propriety of referring it to some committee, for it involves the Supreme Court judges as well as the President. The motive of the bill of course is excellent and its object is admirable. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is the demand of the gentleman from Kentucky for the previous question.

Mr. BEEBE. What is the question on which the previous question is desired?

The SPEAKER. On the third reading and engrossment of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 95.

Mr. WHITE. I demand tellers on the seconding of the previous question.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed

Mr. BRIGHT. Would it not more properly be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as I think that is the main question involved in that bill?

Mr. MORRISON. I insist the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I demand the regular order of business.

MRS. MARTHA E. FITCH.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave of the House, before the regular order of business proceeds, to dispose of a few matters on the Speaker's table.

The petition of Mrs. Martha E. Fitch, of Saint Louis, Missouri, for payment for cotton taken by the United States, having been erroneously referred to the Committee on Claims, that committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the matter and it will be referred to the Committee on War Claims, where it belongs.

3.65 DISTRICT BONDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, asking the consideration of Congress to the necessity for legislative provisions for the payment of the interest on the 3.65 bonds authorized by act of Congress of June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL OFFICERS OVER SIXTY-TWO YEARS OF AGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution of inquiry, adopted by the House on the 5th instant, whether there is in the Navy or Marine Corps any officers over the age of sixty-two; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with section 194 of the Revised Statutes, the names of clerks and other employés in the Department or any of its offices during the year 1875, with the time they were actually employed and the sum paid to each; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was given to Mr. GOODE on account of sickness in his family.

AMNESTY.

The SPEAKER. The business now in order is the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to reconsider the vote by which the amnesty bill was rejected; and upon that the gentleman from Maine has the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the remarks which I shall address to the question before the House, I desire to say that in the discussion on the point of order that was raised just prior to the adjournment last evening, I did not intend to be understood and hope no gentleman understood me as implying that the honorable Speaker intended in any way to deprive me of the right to speak. I did not so understand the Speaker, nor did I understand it to be the motive or object of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL.] I say this much in justice to myself and in justice to the honorable incumbent of the chair.

From the tone of the debate on the opposite side of the Chamber, Mr. Speaker, one would certainly imagine that the republican party, as represented in Congress, was trying to inflict some new punishment or add some fresh stigma to the name of Jefferson Davis, as well indeed as to lay some additional burden on those other citizens of the South who are not yet fully amnestied. It may therefore not be unprofitable just to recall to the attention of the House the precise question at issue, and how it came here, and who it was that brought it here.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania introduced a bill to confer special honor on Jefferson Davis; for what honor can be higher than the full panoplied citizenship of the United States of America? He has lost it by his crimes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes in hot haste, without debate, without amendment, to drag every gentleman up to say "Ay" or "No" upon a bill declaring him to be entitled now and henceforth to all the rights and all the honors of American citizenship. From that we dissent. We did not bring the question here. We are not seeking to throw any fresh element of an inflammatory kind into any discussion or difference that may be between two parties or two sections, and whatever of that kind has grown from this discussion lies at the door of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and those who stand with him.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, it is no proposition to punish but a proposition to honor, and while we disclaim any intention or desire to punish Jefferson Davis, we resist the proposition to honor him. And right here, as a preliminary matter, I desire to address myself for a moment to the constitutional point suggested by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] who addressed the House last evening. He sees and appreciates the magnitude of the crime laid at the door of Jefferson Davis, and he clearly pointed out that neither the gentleman from New York nor the gentleman from Georgia had palliated or dared to palliate the crimes with which I charged him. But he is bothered by the scruple that because we are permitted to punish for participancy in insurrection or rebellion we cannot make any discrimination or distinction. Why the honorable gentleman must have forgotten that this is precisely what we have been doing ever since the disability was imposed. We first removed the disabilities from the least offensive class; then in the next list we removed those next in order of guilty participancy, and so on, until in 1872 we removed the disability from all, except the Army and Navy officers, members of Congress, and heads of Departments. Why, sir, are we not as much justified to-day in excepting Jefferson Davis as we were in 1872 in excepting the seven hundred and fifty, of whom he constitutes one? Therefore I beg to say to my honorable friend, whose co-operation I crave, that that point is res adjudicata by a hundred acts upon the statute-book. We are entirely competent to do just what is proposed in my amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on the question of the treatment of our prisoners and on the great question as to who was to blame for breaking exchange, the speech of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has left me literally nothing to say. He exhausted the subject. His speech was unanswerable, and I undertake to say that as yet no gentleman has answered one fact that he alleged—no gentleman in this House can answer one fact presented by him. I shall not therefore at any length dwell upon that. But in connection with one point in history there is something which I should feel it my duty not merely as a member of the republican party which upheld the administration that conducted the war, but as a citizen of the American Union, to resist and resent, and that is the allegations that were made in regard to the manner in which confederate prisoners were treated in the prisons of the Union. The gentleman from Georgia says:

I have also proved that with all the horrors you have made such a noise about as occurring at Andersonville, greater horrors occurred in the prisons where our troops were held.

And I could not but admire the "our" and the "your" with which the gentleman conducted the whole discussion. It ill comported with his later profession of Unionism. It was certainly flinging the shadow of a dead confederacy a long way over the dial of the National House of Representatives. And I think the gentleman from New York fell into a little of the same line. Of that I shall speak again. The gentleman from Georgia goes on to say that—

The atrocities of Andersonville do not begin to compare with the atrocities of Elmira, of Camp Douglas, of Fort Delaware; and of all the atrocities both at Andersonville and at Elmira the confederate authorities stand acquitted.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield for a moment.

Mr. HILL. I certainly said no such thing. I stated distinctly that I brought no charge of crime against anybody. But I also stated distinctly that according to the gentleman's logic that result followed.

Mr. BLAINE. But that is not the reported speech at all.

Mr. HILL. I stated distinctly that I was following the gentleman's logic.

Mr. BLAINE. I am quoting the gentleman's speech as he delivered it. I quote it as it appeared in the Daily Chronicle and the Associated Press report. I do not pretend to be bound by the version which may appear hereafter, because I observed that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] spoke one speech and published another, [great laughter,] and I suppose the gentleman from Georgia will do the same. I admit that the gentleman has a difficult rôle to play. He has to harmonize himself with the great northern democracy and keep himself in high line as a democratic candidate for Senator from Georgia; and it is a very difficult thing to reconcile the two. [Laughter.] The "barn-burner democrats" in 1853 tried very hard to adhere to their anti-slavery principles in New York and still support the Pierce administration; and Mr. Greeley, with that inimitable humor which he possessed, said that they found it a very hard road to straddle, like a militia general on parade on Broadway, who finds it an almost impossible task to follow the music and dodge the omnibuses. [Laughter.] And that is what the gentleman does. The gentleman tries to keep step to the music of the Union and dodge his fire-eating constituency in Georgia. [Great laughter.]

Then here is another quotation:

We know our prisoners suffered in Federal hands, and we know how, if we chose to tell. Thousands of our poor men came home from Fort Delaware and other places with their fingers frozen off, with their toes frozen off, with their teeth fallen out.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman will allow me to answer. I said that these things were necessary incidents of the horrors of all prisons.

Mr. BLAINE. But the gentleman states that that was a fact? I do not understand him to back down from that assertion?

Mr. HILL. No, sir. I saw it with my own eyes.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, the gentleman from the Elmira district, [Mr. WALKER,] and I honor him for it, was not held in leash as his colleague from New York [Mr. COX] was by party fidelity and Southern sympathy, and came out like a man and vindicated his constituents. The gentleman from Georgia makes this charge of ill-treatment of confederate prisoners at Camp Douglas. There are upon the other side of the Chamber two gentlemen who represent districts that surround Camp Douglas. I refer to Hon. Mr. CAULFIELD and Hon. Mr. HARRISON. I ask those gentlemen whether, to their best knowledge and belief, there was any maltreatment of prisoners at Chicago. I yield them the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman has seen fit to call upon me for my testimony in regard to the treatment of prisoners at Camp Douglas. I do not wish him to suppose from my silence that I would fully acquiesce in what he has stated.

Mr. BLAINE. In what who has stated: the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CAULFIELD. In Camp Douglas.

Mr. BLAINE. In whose statement do you not acquiesce?

Mr. CAULFIELD. In what the gentleman from Maine has stated.

Mr. BLAINE. O!

Mr. CAULFIELD. I rise to say that there were hardships in Camp Douglas which were experienced by the prisoners from the South. But those hardships I say were incidental to the climate and to the emergencies of their imprisonment.

Mr. HILL. That is right.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I do however say that there were certain instances of cruelty which occurred in that camp to my knowledge. But they were not of such a number or of such character as to justify a general charge of cruelty against the officers of the camp.

Mr. HILL. That is right. I made none.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I remember some instances myself. I happened to be one of the visitors appointed to ameliorate the sufferings of those prisoners when they were put in Camp Douglas. They were brought there in the winter. I think the first batch of prisoners we had were from Fort Donelson. The weather was cold. It was impossible in the hurry to make them perfectly comfortable, and as a matter of course there was a good deal of suffering. But I regarded it that the suffering was incidental entirely to the circumstances that surrounded them at the time. Every effort was made to make them comfortable, both upon the part of the citizens and upon the part of the Government. But there were some cruelties inflicted there to my knowledge, but I do not think it would be fair to charge the Government with them. They were chargeable to the inhumanity of certain individuals who were in charge of the prison.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, before the gentleman sits down let him state whether the prisoners who came from Fort Donelson did not occupy and share the same quarters and have exactly the same accommodations that the Illinois troops did who left Camp Douglas, which was their camp, and went down to Donelson and changed places with the prisoners.

Mr. CAULFIELD. My memory on that point does not serve me.

Mr. BLAINE. O, the gentleman does not remember that Camp Douglas was made for Union soldiers; that Camp Douglas was the great recruiting camp of northern Illinois.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Now that you call it to my recollection, I think it was so.

Mr. BLAINE. O my, what a recollection! [Laughter.] That is equal to the recollection of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] who did not recollect the other day the resolution I called to his attention.

Mr. CAULFIELD. My dear sir; I beg the Speaker's pardon. I want the gentleman to understand that when I state that my recollection is to a certain point I do not wish him to stand upon this floor and question my veracity.

Mr. BLAINE. I stated it was an astonishing recollection; I did not question the gentleman's veracity at all.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Then, if it is an astonishing recollection, I am not responsible for it.

Mr. BLAINE. I say this: that if the gentleman does not recollect that Camp Douglas was the recruiting station from which these great, noble, gallant regiments went out that represented Illinois on so many battle-fields, he is the only man in Illinois who does not recollect it.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAINE. That is sufficient; that is all I desire.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman called me to the witness-stand, and he cannot discredit me, because I do not discredit myself. I have the right to answer his question fully. I say to the gentleman that when he first asked the question of me as to whether these atrocities had been committed in Camp Douglas my attention was naturally directed to the time when these men were prisoners there, and his question not being directed to that point my attention was not drawn to the point whether that camp was first occupied by Federal soldiers or not. But now that he has drawn my attention to the fact, I say that I think it was so, and this I may be permitted to say; probably the argument which he makes against my recollection is about as strong as any of the arguments that the gentleman adduces to the House today, or adduced a day or two ago.

Mr. BLAINE. I should not wish them to be stronger.

Mr. HARRISON. Being called upon, I think my colleague [Mr. CAULFIELD] is in error in one respect. I think that Camp Douglas, as the camp where the prisoners were contained, was not the same Camp Douglas where the volunteers were.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I think it was.

Mr. HARRISON. Not so. Many of the buildings were erected on an emergency. When the Fort Donelson prisoners were brought there the weather was exceedingly cold; there were not sufficient houses. But the people of Chicago came forward and gave to them aid and comforts that the Government could not give to them. I will state further that there were charges made, charges in papers, charges that probably an ex parte witness would have sworn to, that there were cruelties practiced at Camp Douglas. But we do not believe those ex parte statements, nor do we believe the ex parte statements brought up by any person here. Some of the prisoners at Camp Douglas suffered from the severity of the weather. It was charged upon the Government——

Mr. BLAINE. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. HARRISON. You have asked me a question, and I want to answer it.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman is not answering it at all; he is going into a long rigmarole that does not touch the question at all.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman has asked me a question, and my silence would be an acknowledgement——

Mr. BLAINE. I asked the gentleman whether he knew of cruelties at that camp.

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. That is enough.

Mr. HARRISON. I have said that I knew of no cruelties.

Mr. BLAINE. Now I wish to ask a gentleman on this side of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. HARRISON] is mistaken in the assertion he has just made. I know of my own personal knowledge that the prisoners confined in Camp Douglas were confined in the same camp which our own soldiers had left when they went in the field.

Mr. HARRISON. But not always the same buildings.

Mr. BLAINE. No; for they were increased, were enlarged for the rebel prisoners.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to say further that I had occasion many times to visit that camp while the rebel prisoners were confined there, and especially because one of my own blood and kindred, from my native State, was a prisoner in that camp. I went there to see him at his own request. I sent him money, for he stated to me that he had no money with which to purchase anything in addition to the rations which were furnished him. He told me that he was well treated; that he had no complaint to make; that he believed the prisoners there were well treated. And I have no sort of doubt but what the rebel prisoners there were as well treated as any prisoners ever were on God's green earth.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not care of course to conduct this case as though it were a case in court. If I did, I could produce a cloud of witnesses. There are honorable gentlemen on that side of the House whom I will not indelicately mention, but who know that personally their relations and mine are most kindly and friendly, who have been in Union prisons in the North, and unless they contradict me I shall assume that their silence assents to the statement.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAINE. Was the gentleman one of them?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I was; and I have been a friend of the gentleman from Maine. I now ask his courtesy for a moment.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor of being a prisoner——

Mr. BLAINE. Where and in what fort?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will tell you if you will allow me two or three minutes. I was not a prisoner of war.

Mr. BLAINE. O!

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. But a citizen prisoner, taken to Camp Chase.

Mr. BLAINE. I am not dealing with that class.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. You are asking for the facts of history.

Mr. BLAINE. No; I am not dealing with that class. The gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I deprecate this most unfortunate debate; but when the gentleman from Maine rises and especially appeals to gentlemen on this side of the House for the facts of history, can he object to hearing them?

Mr. BLAINE. If the House will agree to extend my time, I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I shall be guilty of no discourtesy.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] as I understood, declines to extend the time.

Mr. RANDALL. I will not consent to extend the time.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I decline to yield.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. You will not hear me?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; I will not yield to any remarks of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to do justice by allowing us to be heard when we are appealed to for facts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Kentucky desires to do justice he shall have part of my time in which to do it.

Mr. BLAINE. I must resume the floor. I have given away enough of my time. I was not referring at all to the gentleman from Kentucky; I did not know he had ever been a prisoner.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the remark he made that if gentlemen on this side of the House who as confederates had been prisoners did not rise up and contradict him their silence should be construed as an acknowledgment of his assertion.

Mr. BLAINE. If any gentleman on that side of the House——

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer for one, if the gentleman will allow me. I was a prisoner—a prisoner of war; and I know in my own person that there were cruelties at Fort Delaware.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. DAVIS. They ask for facts and then they will not hear them!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will state his point of order.

Mr. BANKS. My point of order is this: The gentleman from Maine said that if gentlemen on the other side of the House did not express their dissent he should assume that they admitted certain conclusions. Now I think he has no right to make such a declaration unless he intends to give gentlemen the floor to reply, and that he ought in justice to withdraw the remark.

Mr. BLAINE. They can get up and dissent. How else are we to know their dissent? Let them all rise and dissent; I do not object. But I do not intend to yield the whole of my hour.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for just three minutes for the purpose of saying——

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I object if the gentleman from Maine does not yield to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; I am not going to yield.

Mr. MILLS. It is not the desire on this side of the House to open up that question.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, have I the floor?

Mr. MILLS. I have sat here and listened to the charges the gentleman has made; and I do not feel that I am called upon to say anything in reply, but I trust we are not to be put on the record as assenting by our silence to such a falsehood.

The SPEAKER. The point suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not, in the judgement of the Chair, constitute a question of order to be ruled upon by the Chair.

Mr. BANKS. I yield with deference to the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. COOK. I want to say——

Mr. BLAINE. If I am entitled to the floor, Mr. Speaker, I want to have it.

Mr. COOK. I was a prisoner, wounded and crippled, in your hands; and I want to say——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine yield further?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Then ask no more questions.

Mr. COOK. Take back the statement that our silence gives consent.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, if that will do you any good, and if you want all to stand up and dissent I will wait for you to do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. We are not at school now. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the remark of the gentleman from New York, who, as I said, delivered one speech and published another.

Mr. COX. I did not change anything in my speech or in my colloquy with you.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will have time to answer. I say the gentleman from New York delivered one speech and printed another.

Mr. COX. Go on with your talk; you are getting used up on this side. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from New York stated that "he had it on the authority of sixty and odd gentlemen here, many of them having been in the service of the confederacy during the war, that no order was issued at any time in the South relative to prisoners who were taken by the South as to rations or clothing that did not apply equally to their own soldiers, and that any ex parte statements taken by that humbug committee on the conduct of the war could not controvert the facts of history." The gentleman therefore stands up here as denying the atrocities of Andersonville. He seconds the gentleman from Georgia, and gives the weight of whatever may be attached to his word to denying that fact. Now, the gentleman himself did not always talk so. I have here a debate that occurred on the 21st of December, 1864, in which, while the proposition was pending in the House for retaliation, the gentleman, then from Ohio, said:

> This resolution provides for inflicting upon the rebel orisoners who may be in our hands the same inhumane, barbarous, horrible treatment which has been inflicted upon our soldiers held as prisoners by the rebels.
> Now, Mr. Speaker—
> Continued the enraged gentleman at that time—
> it does not follow that because the rebels have made brutes and fiends of themselves that we should do likewise.

Mr. COX. That is good sense.

Mr. BLAINE. "There is," he says, "a certain law of retaliation in war, I know; but," continued the gentleman, "no man will stand up here and say, after due deliberation, that he would reduce these prisoners, thrust into our hands, into the same condition exhibited by these skeletons, these pictures, these anatomies brought to our attention and laid upon the desks of members of Congress." Then the gentleman says: "It does not follow because our prisoners are treated in the way represented, and no doubt truthfully represented." That is what the gentleman said in 1864; but when a solemn committee of Congress, made up of honorable gentlemen of both sides of the House, bring in exactly the statements which verify all this, then the gentleman states "that the authority was a humbug committee."

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. BLAINE. Wait; you will have plenty of time.

Mr. COX. I did not get up to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BLAINE. Now the gentleman takes his side among the great defenders of Andersonville, and states there has been nothing made out against Andersonville except upon ex parte statements.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I do not wish to be interrupted, I would like, by a nod, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] will be good enough to tell me—for he is a well-practiced lawyer and I am not one at all; and when witnesses are in doubt they are allowed time to reflect and refresh their memory—I ask him to tell me after reflection whether he recollects having introduced this resolution into the confederate senate.

Mr. HILL. Which?

Mr. BLAINE. The following:

Senator Hill, of Georgia, introduced the following resolution in the confederate congress in October, 1862: "That every person pretending to be a soldier or officer of the United States who shall be captured on the soil of the confederate States after the first day of January, 1863, shall be presumed to have entered the territory of the Confederate States with intent to incite insurrection and to abet murder; and, unless satisfactory proof be adduced to the contrary before the military court before which the trial shall be had, he shall suffer death. And this section shall continue in force until the proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln, dated Washington, September 22, 1872, shall be rescinded."

Did the gentleman introduce that resolution?

Mr. HILL. Do you want an answer?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I will say this: I state precisely and frankly, as I stated to the gentleman day before yesterday, that I do not recollect being the author of that resolution. I have no doubt the resolution was introduced, and I will state this: that at the time there was a belief in the confederacy——

Mr. BLAINE. I did not yield for a speech. I only wanted to know that.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAINE. I decline to be interrupted in that way.

Mr. HILL. I have a right to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman has no right whatever in my hour. If my hour is extended I have no objection to his speaking.

Mr. HILL. That resolution applies only to spies.

Mr. BLAINE. O! Nonsense. It says, "Every person pretending to be a soldier or officer," and now the gentleman says it applies only to spies.

Mr. HILL. "Pretending to be."

Mr. BLAINE. O, my! [Laughter.] Well, Mr. Speaker, what does this mean? What did the gentleman from Georgia mean when, from the committee on the judiciary, he introduced the following?

2. Every white person who shall act as a commissioned or non-commissioned officer, commanding negroes or mulattoes against the Confederate States, or who shall arm, organize, train, or prepare negroes or mulattoes for military service, or aid them in any military enterprise against the Confederate States, shall, if captured, suffer death.

Was that a spy, too?

Mr. HILL. Will you allow me to answer that?

Mr. BLAINE. You will have your time.

Mr. HILL. Will you allow me now?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir. I have no time to spare, and cannot yield the floor.

3. Every commissioned or non-commissioned officer of the enemy who shall incite slaves to rebellion, or pretend to give them freedom, under the aforementioned act of Congress and proclamation, by abducting, or causing them to be abducted, or inducing them to abscond, shall, if captured, suffer death.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have searched somewhat, but in vain, for anything in the world that rivals this. I did find, and have here in my minutes, the proclamation of Valmeseda, the captain-general of Cuba, who was recalled by Spain because of his atrocious cruelties to the inhabitants of that island; and the worst thing in all the atrocities laid to his charge was that he proclaimed "that every man or boy over fifteen years found away from his house, not being able to give a satisfactory reason therefor, should suffer death." He copied it from the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HILL. That is not true. There is no resemblance whatever.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a copy of the Atlanta Constitution, printed on the 24th of January, 1875. We are told that all these allegations against Jefferson Davis should be forgiven because they are all of the dead past.

Mr. HILL. I am alive. Put me on trial.

Mr. BLAINE. We are told that we should not revive them, that there should be nothing in the world brought up in any way to disturb the beautiful serenity of the centennial year, and that to make any allusion to them whatever is to do an unwelcome and unpatriotic act. The very last declaration we have from Jefferson Davis authentically, in the life which the gentleman from Georgia held the other day as a text-book, reads thus:

Time will show, however, the amount of truth in the prophecy of Jefferson Davis—

Says the biographer, made in reply to the remark that the cause of the confederacy was lost. Mr. Davis said:

It appears so, but the principle for which we contended is bound to re-assert itself, though it may be at another time and in another form.

Now I have here, of the date of January 24, 1875, a speech by Hon. B. H. HILL, in the Atlanta Constitution, and it is said to have been the "grandest speech" he ever delivered.

Mr. HILL. O, that is a mistake.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman says it is a mistake. I know he has delivered some very grand speeches, but the editor characterizes this as the grandest of them all. I quote from him:

Fellow-citizens, I look to the contest of 1876 not only as the most important that ever occurred in American history, but as the most important in the history of the world; for if the people of the country cannot be aroused to give an overwhelming vote against this republican party it will perpetuate itself in power in the United States by precisely the same means that the President has taken in Louisiana, and the people will be powerless to prevent it except they go to war. [Applause.] If we fail with the ballot-box in 1876 by reason of force, a startling question will present itself to the American people. I trust we will not fail. I hope the northern people have had a sufficient subsidence of passion to see this question fairly.

Then the gentleman goes on to say—

If we must have war—

why his voice is always for war.

Mr. HILL. Never, never!

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman says—

If we must have war; if we cannot preserve this Constitution and constitutional Government by the ballot; if force is to defeat the ballot; if the war must come—God forbid that it should come—but if it must come; if folly, if wickedness, if inordinate love of power shall decree that America must save her Constitution by blood, let it come; I am ready.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. BLAINE. Not now. There will be plenty of time. And then the gentleman said in another speech of May 12:

He impressed upon the colored men of the country the truth that, if the folly and wickedness were consummated in war, they would be the greatest sufferers. If peace was preserved they were safe, but as sure as one war had freed them, just as sure another war would re-enslave them.

Now that was precisely the kind of talk we had here by folios and reams before the rebellion. O, yes; you were for war then. The gentleman in his speech says that the Union now is an unmixed blessing, providing the democratic party can rule it, but that if the republican party must rule it he is for war. Why, that is just what Jefferson Davis said in 1861.

Mr. HILL. If brought on by force.

Mr. BLAINE. O, you call the predominance of the republican party force!

Mr. HILL. I say it is, if you force it against the will of the people.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah, that is "paltering in a double sense."

Mr. HILL. Against the will of the people as expressed at the ballot-box.

Mr. BLAINE. I repeat, that is "paltering in a double sense." What the gentleman means, if he means anything, is that if the South can come back to rule this country with the aid of the northern democracy, he is in favor of the Union; but if the republican party is to hold power, he is in favor of war.

Mr. HILL. No, sir; I am for the Union all the time.

Mr. BLAINE. Then you take back what you said at Atlanta?

Mr. HILL. No; I stand by what I said, that if you force war upon us we will fight for the Constitution and the Union.

Mr. BLAINE. Who is talking about war?

Mr. HILL. You.

Mr. BLAINE. It was the gentleman who was preparing the hearts of his people for war.

I have here very much more of the same kind. I have been supplied with very abundant literature emanating from the gentleman, more, indeed, than I have had time to read. He seems to have been as voluminous as the Spanish chroniclers. In one speech he says:

I must say a word about this list of disabilities removed. I would rather see my name recorded in the Georgia penitentiary than to find it on a list of the removal of disabilities. Why, my friends, do you not know that when you go to that Congress and ask for a removal of disabilities you admit that you are a traitor?

Mr. HILL. What do you read from?

Mr. BLAINE. From a report in the Cincinnati Daily Gazette, giving an account of a great meeting in 1868 at which Howell Cobb, Robert Toombs, and the Hon. B. H. HILL made speeches. And there the gentleman declared that he would rather have his name on the list of the Georgia penitentiary than on a list of the removal of disabilities.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to stir up more needless ill-blood, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] yesterday, apparently without much thought, spoke of a class of men in the Southern States who had committed perjury, and I would like to address the gentleman a question that he can answer when he gets the floor.

Mr. HILL. Will you not allow me to answer it now?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; not now. Suppose you inaugurate a great war if the republican party retains power, and you and all these gentlemen who sympathize with you upon this floor, and who had taken an oath to bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, and that you took that oath without mental reservation, then revolt against the country; what would that be? Would it have any relation to perjury?

Mr. HILL. I should stand up for the Constitution against you, who are trying to destroy it.

Mr. BLAINE. And go out of the Union.

Mr. HILL. O, no. We are not going out any more. No, sir. [Laughter.] We are in, and we are going to stay in.

Mr. BLAINE. But, Mr. Speaker, you see the effect of the speeches of the gentleman from Georgia. They are very tremendous down there. The very earth quakes under him. One of his organs says:

We assert without fear of contradiction that Mr. HILL in his bitter denunciation of scalawags and carpet-baggers has deterred thousands of them from entering the ranks of the radical party. They dare not do so for fear of social ostracism, and to-day the white population of Georgia are unanimous in favor of the democratic party.

And when he can get the rest of the States to the same standard he is for war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman cannot, by withholding his speech here and revising it and adapting it to the northern democracy, erase his speeches in Georgia. I have quoted from them. I have quoted from democrat papers. There is no accusation that there is any perversion in republican papers or that he was misrepresented. But the gentleman deliberately states that in a certain contingency of the republican party having power he is for war; and I undertake here to say that, in all the mad, hot wrath in the Thirty-sixth Congress that precipitated the revolt in this country there is not one speech to be found that breathes a more determined rebellion against lawful authority or a guiltier readiness to resist it than the speech of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. Speaker, I have not much time left. I said briefly in my first speech that God forbid I should lay at the door of the southern people, as a people, these atrocities. I repeat it. I lay no such charge at their door. Sir, I have read in this "ex parte humbug report" that there were deep movements among the southern people about these atrocities; that there was a profound sensibility. I know that the leading officers of the confederacy protested against them; I know that many of the subordinate officers protested against them. I know that an honerable gentleman from North Carolina, now representing his State in the other end of the Capitol, protested against them. But I have searched the records in vain to find that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] protested against them. They were known to the confederate congress; they were known at the doorway of your senate and along the corridors of your capitol. The honorable and venerable gentleman in my eye at this moment who served in the confederate congress, and who had before served in the Senate of the United States, himself brought them to the attention of the confederate congress, and I class him with great gladness among those whose humanity was never quenched by the fires of the rebellion. I allude to Hon. Henry S. Foote.

Now, to show how entirely these matters were known among us, I want to read from the Journal of the House for the 7th day of January, 1864. I beg the attention of the House to the following:

> Whereas a large number of our brave and patriotic soldiers and officers are now incarcerated in prisons in the Southern States, and are there exposed to the peril of famine, diseases of different kinds, and hardships whereby they are daily dying without aid or comfort; and whereas the rebel prisoners now confined in the United States are not exposed to these hardships, nor to the diseases incident to an unhealthy climate, by means whereof there is no reciprocity between the condition of our officers and privates taken prisoners and confined and the rebel prisoners in our possession; and whereas this state of things is most oppressive and unequal, and fatal to the lives and health of those who have been captured fighting for the Constitution and Union, and is impoverishing the strength of our armies, &c., &c.

That is the preamble of a certain resolution relating to the exchange of prisoners. I call attention to the recital in that preamble as a summing at that time of the knowledge obtained by the American Congress of the condition of prisoners on both sides of the line. And the gentleman who offered that resolution, I take pleasure in saying, was Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It is not with the same pleasure that I recall the fact that a resolution offered by Mr. Washburn, of Illinois, was opposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] That resolution is:

> That this House approve of the constant, statesmanlike, and humane efforts of the Administration to secure an exchange of our prisoners now in the hands of the rebels, and that it is hereby recommended that such efforts be continued to secure an exchange of all our prisoners now in southern prisons.

Among those who voted against the resolution was Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, then of Ohio.

Mr. COX. The gentleman interrupted me five times day before yesterday.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not be interrupted. I will state that the honorable gentleman——

Mr. COX. The honorable gentleman from Maine interrupted me five times, and I let him in.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has notified me that I cannot have the courtesy of having my time extended.

Mr. RANDALL. I have already extended all manner of courtesies to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. Well, howl away; you are a hyena.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman first offered a resolution demanding that all the papers on the subject should be sent to Congress, which in itself was an unpatriotic resolution, because the War Department did not wish to have them made public. Mr. Washburn offered the one I have read as a substitute, and the gentleman from New York, then from Ohio, not only voted against substituting the resolution but also voted against it after it was substituted.

My time is running and I have very little left. I confess—and I say it to the gentleman from Georgia with no personal unkindness—I confess that my very blood boiled, if there was anything of tradition, of memory, of feeling, it boiled, when I heard the gentleman, with his record, which I have read, seconded and sustained by the gentleman from New York, arraigning the administration of Abraham Lincoln, throwing obloquy and slander upon the grave of Edwin M. Stanton and demanding that Jefferson Davis should be restored to full citizenship in this country. Ah! that is a novel spectacle; the gentleman from Georgia does not know how novel; the gentleman from New York ought to know. The gentleman from Georgia does not know, and he cannot know how many hundred thousands of northern bosoms were lacerated by his course.

Mr. HILL. I never said it, Mr. BLAINE; you are mistaken.

Mr. BLAINE. O, no; you accused the administration of Mr. Lincoln with breaking the cartel and violating the honor of the Government, and a thousand other things; the speech as published in the papers show it. And as soon as he made it the gentleman from New York run to him in hot haste to congratulate him, sympathizing, I suppose, with the assault.

Mr. HILL. Upon that subject I read nothing but published letters and documents, and of northern origin at that.

Mr. BLAINE. I repeat, that proposition strikes—I might say almost terror into northern hearts; that here, in an American Congress, the gentleman who offered that resolution in the confederate congress, who in his campaign for a seat in this House comes here breathing threatenings and slaughter, who comes here telling you that in a certain contingency he means war, advising his people to be ready for it—that gentleman, profaning the very altar of patriotic liberty with the speech that sends him here, arraigning the Administration that conducted the war and saved the Union—that gentleman asks us to join with him in paying the last full measure of honor that an American Congress can pay to the arch-enemy of the Union, the arch-fiend of the rebellion.

Suppose Jefferson Davis is not pardoned; suppose he is not amnestied. O! you cannot have a centennial year without that! No man on this side has ever intimated that Jefferson Davis should be refused pardon on account of any political crimes; it is too late for that; it is because of a personal crime.

If you ask that there may be harmonious and universal rejoicing over every forgiven man, release all your criminals; set free every man who has been sentenced for piracy or for murder by your United States courts; proclaim the jubilee indeed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Forgive men who have committed other murders!

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, as my friend from New York suggests, remit all the penalties for the commission of other murders less numerous and less cruel.

Mr. HEREFORD. And the whisky convicts!

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, that reminds me of one thing which in the haste and pressure of my hour I might have forgotten. The gentleman from Georgia aimed to be very humorous about General Grant, and said that the logic which I had presented the other day in regard to Jefferson Davis made General Grant responsible for McDonald and Joyce. The gentleman might have thought that he was witty, but I could not see it.

Mr. HILL. I know you could not.

Mr. BLAINE. It was not so witty as the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] It was more grim. If Jefferson Davis, the moment the crimes of Andersonville had been brought to his attention, had arraigned the offenders with all competent authority, and had issued an order that "no guilty man should escape," there would be some little consistency in the gentleman's position. It was therefore ill-conceived levity, and in very bad taste, for the gentleman to introduce General Grant's name in that connection.

But I am authorized, if the gentleman desires it—not authorized especially to mention it here, but I mention it on the authority of General Grant, whom the gentleman from Georgia impugned in connection with the exchange of prisoners——

Mr. HILL. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. To say that one thing touching the exchange of prisoners was that the Davis government observed no honor in regard to it; and General Grant states that the brigade of Carter L. Stephenson, that was dislodged at Chattanooga, was made up of paroled prisoners from Vicksburgh, and that Stephenson himself was one of them. He states that the paroled prisoners of one day in front of his line were taken the next. But in stating this he was careful to say that, as to Lee and the two Johnstons and Pemberton, and the other leading confederate generals, their word was honor itself; but that for the Davis executive government there was no honor in it—none whatever. The gentleman has got enough of General Grant by this time, I hope.

Now, in regard to the relative number of prisoners that died in the North and the South, respectively, the gentleman undertook to show that a great many more prisoners died in the hands of the Union authorities than in the hands of the rebels. I have had conversations with surgeons of the Army about that, and they say that there were a large number of deaths of rebel prisoners, but that during the latter period of the war they came into our hands very much exhausted, ill-clad, ill-fed, diseased, so that they died in our prisons of diseases that they brought with them. And one eminent surgeon said, without wishing at all to be quoted in this debate, that the question was not only what was the condition of the prisoners when they came to us, but what it was when they were sent back. Our men were taken in full health and strength; they came back wasted and worn—mere skeletons. The rebel prisoners, in large numbers, were, when taken, emaciated and reduced; and General Grant says that at the time such superhuman efforts were made for exchange there were 90,000 men that would have re-enforced your armies the next day, prisoners in our hands who were in good health and ready for fight. This consideration sheds a great deal of light on what the gentleman states.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] puts a letter into my hands. I read it without really knowing what it may show:

CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Richmond, Virginia, March 21, 1863.

MY DEAR SIR: If the exigencies of our army require the use of trains for the transportation of corn, pay no regard to the Yankee prisoners. I would rather they should starve than our own people suffer.

I suppose I can safely put it in writing: "Let them suffer." The words are memorable, and it is fortunate that in this case they can be applied properly and without the intervention of a lying quartermaster.

Very truly, your faithful friend,

ROBT. OULD.

Colonel A. C. MYERS.

That is a good piece of literature in this connection. Mr. Ould, I believe, was the rebel commissioner to exchange. When the gentleman from Georgia next takes the floor I want him to state what excuse there was for ordering the Florida artillery, in case General Sherman's army got within seven miles of Andersonville, to fire on that stockade.

Mr. HILL. That was just to keep your Army from coming. That is all.

Mr. BLAINE. Upon this point letters have flowed in upon me—letters which, without pretending to any extraordinary tenderness, I say in this presence I could not read without unbecoming emotion.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to say——

Mr. BLAINE. I have a letter which states that at Andersonville they had stakes put up with flags in order that the line of fire might be properly directed from the battery of Florida artillery.

Mr. HILL. O, that is not so.

Mr. BLAINE. There is that order.

Mr. HILL. That is said to be a forgery. I do not know whether it is genuine or not. You have the records; we have not; you will not let us see them. You merely say what they are. Let us see the whole of them.

Mr. BLAINE. Let us take one single case. I suppose the gentleman would deny that they ever used bloodhounds at Andersonville.

Mr. HILL. O, no; though I do not myself know the fact.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the gentleman ever hear of Colonel James H. Fannin, of the First Georgia reserves, who was on duty at Andersonville?

Mr. HILL. O, yes.

Mr. BLAINE. He says "that Surgeon Turner, the owner of the dogs, belonged to the first regiment of reserves of my company? Then he goes on to tell how the dogs were obtained and how used; and here is one of the returns made by Wirz:

Twenty-five men more escaped during the month, but they were taken by the dogs before the daily returns were made out.

The gentleman is a very able lawyer——

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Has not the time of the gentleman from Maine expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.) The time of the gentleman from Maine has not expired.

Mr. HANCOCK. He commenced ten minutes before one o'clock.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask that the fifty-seventh rule of the House be read. I should like to have it read, because the gentleman from Maine is constantly violating the rules of this House.

Mr. BLAINE. In what respect?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is out of order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope it will not be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker of the House set the dial exactly at the time the gentleman from Maine commenced his speech, showing exactly when his hour will expire, and the present occupant of the chair when that time is reached will notify the House.

Mr. BLAINE. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. About two minutes.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman is inconsistent. I should like to get him to admit something. He does not deny that bloodhounds were used at Andersonville.

Mr. HILL. I understood they were; I do not know; farm dogs, not bloodhounds.

Mr. BLAINE. Here are four or five Georgia witnesses. I conclude in the two minutes left me by saying that in all the evidence I have adduced I have never asked to bring in one piece of Union testimony; the whole of it is from confederate prisoners.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the administration of Martin Van Buren, that went down in a popular convulsion in 1840, had no little of obloquy thrown upon it because it had ventured to hunt the Seminoles in the swamps of Florida with bloodhounds.

A MEMBER. No bloodhounds there.

Mr. BLAINE. Blood-thirsty dogs were sent after the hiding savages, and the civilization of the nineteenth century and the Christian feeling of the American people revolted at it. And I state here, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] cannot deny it, that upon the testimony of witnesses as numerous as would require me all day to read bloodhounds were used; that large packs of them were kept, and Georgia officers commanded them; that they were sent after the poor unfortunate, shrinking men who by any accident could get out of that horrible stockade. I state, sir, that the civilization of the world stands aghast at what was done at Andersonville. And the man who did that was sustained by Jefferson Davis, and promoted. Yet the gentleman says that was analogous to General Grant sending McDonald to the penitentiary and found a striking analogy in that.

Mr. Speaker, in view of all these facts I have only to say that if the American Congress, by a two-thirds vote, shall pronounce Jefferson Davis worthy to be restored to the full rights of American citizenship, I can only vote against it and hang my head in silence, and regret it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLAINE. I move the previous question on the motion to reconsider. I do that by agreement.

Mr. RANDALL. It was given to you as a boon.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, then I give it back if you want it.

Mr. RANDALL. You insisted on it as a right.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; you can take it back.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I now take the floor and will yield thirty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeds, the Chair will state that all interruption by way of applause is entirely inconsistent with the dignity and gravity of the House of Representatives and the discussion of this important question, and hopes the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusettts [Mr. BANKS] will be received without applause on either side of the House. The galleries must be quiet

Mr. BANKS, Mr. Speaker, I gave notice yesterday that if I had an opportunity I should move an amendment to the bill before the House, proposing that some declaration or oath should be made in case the amnesty was granted to the persons who are now resting under political disabilities; and as the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded me the floor, I understand it will not be an impropriety on my part or an invasion of the privilege which he has granted me, if I propose such an amendment. It is to strike out all after the seventh line of the first section of his bill, and insert, instead of the part stricken out, these words:

And shall be forever relieved therefrom upon their appearing before a judge of any court of the United States or any court of record of the State in which they are resident, and taking and subscribing the following oath, to be duly attested and recorded, to wit: I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same, and obey all laws made in pursuance thereof; and that I take this obligation freely, and without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion whatever.

I send my amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HALE. I object to the gentleman's amendment, unless the amendment of my colleague [Mr. BLAINE] be admitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has merely been read for the information of the House, and is not pending.

Mr. BANKS. I have the floor for the purpose of moving at the proper time this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not consider that the amendment is now in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course not.

Mr. RANDALL. If the Chair will permit me I will state how I can allow that amendment to be brought in. The gentleman from Maine, perhaps unwittingly, in arguing yesterday that he should be allowed to speak to-day, and taking that right, has lost the opportunity to move a reconsideration of the engrossment of this bill, so that any amendment could come in. The gentleman from Maine perhaps forgot that after the second day a motion to reconsider the engrossment of a bill is not in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, how are you going to get your amendment in at all?

Mr. RANDALL. I will suggest that, if you will allow me. Just be easy. I propose to ask the unanimous consent of this House that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have the opportunity of offering that amendment, and I do not expect the gentleman from Maine to object.

Mr. BLAINE. I do object.

Mr. RANDALL. Perhaps I can find out some other avenue by which the object can be reached, and you are only exposing the insincerity of your conduct here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that the amendment as now offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is not now in order.

Mr. RANDALL. We shall manage it, I think, so as to make it in order—unless the gentleman from Maine prevents.

Mr. BANKS. It is not my purpose, sir, to engage in the discussion of the subjects which have occupied the attention of the House for most of this week. The amendment which I have read embodies my views of the question, and it is my purpose to confine myself to that subject. I am not opposed to the passage of a general amnesty bill, and, if compelled, very likely I should vote for such a bill as this, without any declaration or condition connected with it. The last House of Representatives, I am informed, passed a bill to the same effect if not in the exact words of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But there is one consideration that bears upon this question to which I think gentlemen will give their assent.

Sir, without any intention of casting personal reflections upon anybody, I take one person as an illustration of the principle I have stated, and that is one whose name has been continually mentioned in this debate as the head of the confederacy lately at war with the United States—Mr. Jefferson Davis. Mr. Davis has, I understand, abjured his allegiance to the United States. He took upon himself an oath of fealty to a government hostile to that of the United States, and I do not understand that he has since taken any oath of allegiance to the United States or the Constitution thereof as it now exists.

Sir, other men who have received pardon of the Government of the United States and have been restored to their political rights have, more or less of them, taken the oath of allegiance to the Constitution as it now exists under the proclamation of President Lincoln or the proclamation of President Johnson or under the several acts relating to the reconstruction of the Government, most if not all of which required the taking of an oath by the parties who accepted the privileges conferred by those acts.

Gentlemen have said to me as a reason why this proposition should not be embodied in the bill before the House that all these men have at one time or another taken an oath of allegiance. But I think, sir, from what occurred yesterday, the probability is that Jefferson Davis has not.

Now, if he should be embraced in this amnesty, he stands in the position of having abjured his allegiance to the United States, having taken the oath of fealty to a government hostile to the United States, and then of being restored to the same political rights that any other citizen of the United States has, with the right of election and of being elected to office, with the obligation of an oath to support a hostile government resting upon him.

But gentlemen say that he will have to take an oath if he is elected to office; but that is not sufficient. There are perhaps in the United States under the General Government and that of the several States, from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand officeholders, most of whom must have taken the oath of allegiance to the United States; there are also about eight millions of men who by right of birth or naturalization owe an undisputed allegiance to the United States, and who are invested with the privilege of electing or being elected to office, and this is one of the highest privileges conferred upon or enjoyed by American citizens. It is not right that this one man should be admitted to this privilege without having made, as these men did in one form or another, a direct declaration of intention to support the Constitution—obey the laws of the Government. Sir, I trust the gentlemen on the other side of the House who are so earnest in support of this bill will not refuse a proposition of this character, so manifestly proper in itself as applicable to this case.

Now the difference between my amendment and that of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is that it does not, as his does, except Jefferson Davis from the operation of the general amnesty proposed. He has stated as the ground on which he makes his objection to the extension of amnesty to Mr. Davis that he was guilty of individual crime against the United States; that he was responsible, and should be held responsible, for the atrocities committed at Andersonville and other places during the war. For myself, I do not hold him responsible for these atrocities. I believe that any man who has been connected with executive government will be ready to concede that every executive officer, every man charged with the chief executive direction of any form of government, is compelled by virtue of and in consequence of his position to do many things absolutely disapproved by his judgment. This is one of these concessions constantly made in order to secure the support and co-operation of opponents to measures deemed indispensable. I do not hold that the President of the United States is at this moment responsible for all or any of the acts of his subordinates, no matter how near may be their connection with him or how closely they may be allied to him by personal or political relationship.

Nor do I hold Jefferson Davis responsible for all that occurred under the government of which he assumed to be the head. In regard to the atrocities of Andersonville I have this to say: It is impossible for the people of the loyal States to believe that great cruelties did not occur in this and other prisons. It is very likely impossible for gentlemen who were in some measure connected with the affairs of the confederate government to believe that the representations made here as to occurrences at Andersonville are truthfully made, or that they can be held responsible for such charges as are freely thrown out against them. Now, before this question can be settled by the people of the country or the Congress of the United States, all of these parties must be heard. Men cannot be convicted of crime or cruelty in the nature of crime unless we give them a fair, just, and full hearing, nor can Jefferson Davis be held responsible by us here in our action on this subject, according to my belief, for this crime until he shall have been heard. He has the right to be heard before he is condemned. Therefore I assent with my whole heart to the declaration of my honorable colleague [Mr. SEELYE] yesterday, that these matters of crime do not belong to the question before the House. They are a part of the history of the country, and it is impossible yet for us to unite in any declaration on the subject which shall express the honest sentiment of all classes of the people and all sections of the country. It belongs to another and totally different series of events, and not to this great question of universal amnesty which is before the House. The record which has been read of the report of the congressional committee, very carefully prepared and undoubtedly with a definite purpose before the minds of those who prepared it, we must believe to be substantially true. I cannot say that I disbelieve it, but I can say that it is not history; still more, it is not the judgment of history. It is what the French call materials to serve for history. Nor can I believe entirely the representations which are made by gentlemen on the other side, nor can I believe they are false or dishonest or disloyal in their representations. They are in their estimation absolute facts the consideration of which is indispensable to a correct understanding of the matter. They are materials which are to serve for the future history of the country.

The history of the war has not been and cannot yet be written. It cannot be written in regard to those who were opposed to the existence of the Union. It has not been and it cannot be written in regard to the officers and soldiers of the Army who periled their lives in the defense of the Union. There is too much of passion, too much of prejudice, too little regard for truth, too little regard for the great principle upon which our Government rests, too little regard for individual and general justice, to allow us to make a careful and a just survey of the circumstances of the occasion, to give a verdict which will be accepted by the world as a complete vindication of the truth and the whole truth. There are too many tempting prizes before us, and we are too deeply interested in our efforts to grasp them, to be able to concede all that one side may demand, or grant all that may be due to the other. The history of the war is not yet written. The history of Mr. Davis's participation in it is not written. There is yet no recognized, accepted, and final judgment upon these questions except that connected with the result of the war.

The opinions of gentlemen who have participated in this debate on either side are not yet so firmly established that their assertions cannot be gainsaid. Who will make that history? I do not know, but it will be done faithfully and all parties will receive justice. Lord Bacon said that he left his name and reputation to after ages and to foreign nations. It is quite possible that the history of this bloody episode in the history of our country to which reference is so constantly made will in the end be written, and judgment pronounced that will be accepted by the world as a true verdict in the case, by citizens of a foreign state. I am perfectly sure that we cannot do it now or here. I dismiss from my mind all consideration of the declarations and denunciations, the criminations and recriminations, which for a week past we have so constantly heard in this Chamber.

I do not doubt that the soldiers of the confederacy in the North may have suffered, nor do I doubt that the soldiers of the Union when in the South may have suffered terribly. That was incident to the condition of things. For the guilty, whoever they may be, I pray forgiveness; for the suffering, whoever they may have been and wheresoever they are, I invoke the blessing of God; and for the crimes themselves, I say let the earth hide them. [Applause.] Let us shut them from our sight. Let us believe that these questions will hereafter be properly weighed and all parties receive whatever of credit or honor may be justly due them; that the judgment of the country and of the world will be satisfied thereby.

I prefer to turn as a guide for myself in my action here as a member of this House to other considerations. I leave the past and look to the future. I turn my attention to that which is before us. It is impossible for me to decide or to settle that which is past. If I should follow the counsel of the gentleman from Maine and his friends, I could change nothing of the past; not one of the dead could be raised to life; not one wound assuaged; not one sorrow or one sigh be diminished by anything that can now be done. Let that which is past and gone, not to be changed and affected by anything within the scope of human power, remain for the impartial investigation which is to come hereafter—which must come hereafter; let it stand for those who will be able and capable of ascertaining and pronouncing that judgment.

Let us look at the present condition of the country. There is one thing more especially desirable than any other in the present condition of affairs. That is peace, general peace, peace in all sections and with all parties, with all classes and with all races. The depression which rests upon the country, which is taking from men their property, from laborers their employment, from women and children their bread, which is destroying not only the welfare of the present but imperiling the hopes of the future, arises from the disturbance of the peace of this country. Now, I do not know but these gentlemen on one side and the other can restore that prosperity by proceeding indefinitely with the remarks with which we have been entertained for three or four days past, but I do not believe it. They cannot come to any conclusion on these questions of the past. They cannot agree among themselves, with the official records in their hands, how many Union soldiers have been removed from positions about this House within the last two or three weeks, or how many have been appointed. They cannot agree among themselves even as to words spoken here in our very presence within the last hour and of which the record is scarcely dry. How is it possible, then, that we can come to any conclusion as to the facts of the last fifteen years, of the greater part of which we know only one side, and that side consistent with their interests and wishes? No, sir; we cannot do it.

But we can look to the condition of the country. We want peace. I suppose that the best way to establish the peace of the country is to cease controversy upon that which is past. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has introduced here a bill looking to the peace of the country. He says that it is in the exact terms of a bill passed by the last republican House of Representatives a year or more ago. It is for that reason that I accept it; it is for that reason I have already given it my support. It is for the peace of the country, and it comes at a time when nothing else will give peace to the country. This is the first step that is to be taken in that regard; nothing else will answer in the place of it. All the propositions of the gentleman from Maine or other gentlemen on this side of the House, or of those who have combated him on the other, will not give peace to the country. We want this identical declaration on the part of the Government, that the legal existence of the cause of offense between the two sections shall be removed from the statute-books of the country.

That is what we want. Sir, the people want it. Gentlemen have said that the republican party or the democratic party is entitled to great credit for having introduced from time to time these measures ameliorating the condition of those who were engaged in war against the country. Sir, whoever has done this has been compelled to do it by the people of the country. The very first act of reconstruction—I think the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, which gave to the States that had been engaged in insurrection the opportunity to return upon certain conditions therein specified—was forced upon Congress as a preliminary preparation before the congressional election of 1866 by the public sentiment of the country. So with all of these measures.

Now, sir, I speak in part for New England; I speak rather in part for Massachusetts. Lexington and Bunker Hill are in the district I represent. I believe I can truthfully say (and I would say nothing except what I can say with truth according to my judgment) that the whole people of Massachusetts desire that this measure—the first step necessary to peace—shall be adopted. They exhibited this desire at Lexington and Concord on the one-hundredth anniversary of the first battles of the Revolution and at Bunker Hill on the hundredth anniversary of the battle of the 17th of June, 1775. Those who had been the enemies of the country, who came there with the uniforms of their respective States and with arms in their hands, were welcomed by the whole people with the same greetings, the same acclamations, the same joy with which they welcomed the sons of Massachusetts who had been fighting the battles of the country in arms against them. [Applause.] Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that this was no pre-arranged demonstration for private or public purposes. It was not made by committees or candidates for office, nor by men who had any political aspirations whatever; but it came from the hearts of the people—men, women, and children—representing all classes, all interests, all opinions. Individually and separately they might have hesitated, as we do here, to express our honest feelings; but when they found themselves together, and all animated by the same thought and the same aspirations—that of reconciliation and peace—they gave such an utterance to their universal joy as the world never witnessed before. It was an inspiration gathered from the amicable union of hitherto hostile members of the same family, from the day that brought and the great events that it commemorated.

The men from South Carolina or Virginia or Maryland could not have been more surprised at this universal demonstration of joy and welcome in the streets of Boston than were the people of Massachusetts. It was an honest sentiment. A purer exhalation never rose from the human race than that which ascended to heaven from the hearts of the people on that day. [Applause.]

Now, sir, I hope, that Massachusetts will give a vote approaching unanimity upon this question. If Jefferson Davis has been guilty of crime, let him be tried and punished. Why should we plead the statute of limitations for him? We have had him in our custody; we have had him under indictment, with all the information against him that is now in the possession of the Government. Yet we did not press his case to a trial, still less to a conviction. Sir, at this very desk where I now stand, the counsel of the Government of the United States in the prosecution against Jefferson Davis came to me and advised me, as they advised other Representatives from Massachusetts, that it was not wise for the Government to proceed with the trial in that case. In the face of such a fact, why shall we stand up here and mar the great act of this century, that of universal amnesty and peace, by a reference to the errors or crimes which we may believe Davis to have committed?

The act of amnesty, sir, is not a mere congressional act. It is not the act of Congress alone: it is the act of a great people. It will stand in history as the great event of this century. This is the first time in the history of the world that a great nation, with its millions of people, after having gone through a terrible struggle of civil war, has risen in its majesty and said, "Let those who have been the enemies of the country be forgiven!" No record, no declaration on the part of any government from the creation of the world will compare in majesty and sublimity with this act if it shall be passed. To take this majestic declaration of the people, demanded by them and believed by them to be just, and plaster it with citations and proofs more or less conclusive of crimes that may be charged against any individvidual is to

> Blur the grace and glow
> Of clemency; to take the rose
> From the fair forehead of a Godlike act,
> And stick a blister there.

[Applause.]

These crimes, these cruelties, these atrocities which have been so constantly named here are in the line of criminal procedure. This House is no place for their discussion, still less for their adjudication, still less for the verdict of truth and justice upon them. The penalty, if it shall be enforced, is ineffably inadequate to the punishment for the crime if it shall have been found to be true. This is no place then, sir, for its consideration. We must leave it to other tribunals; we cannot master it. But it is the place and this is the hour for that declaration in the name of the people of this country that gives pardon, grace, and amnesty, that seeks to draw the veil of oblivion over all the horrors of that terrible contest through which we have triumphantly passed. I hope gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as gentlemen on the other, if they can make a bill that shall be at all adequate to the expression of this idea, will give their unanimous support to it. It ought to come from the House of Representatives in order to do justice to the sentiment of the people, and with such unanimity as to command the respect and admiration of the world. I think it can be so made and I hope it will be so done.

Mr. Speaker, when the people of other nations visit us during the present year they will come to witness the achievements of republican government after the expiration of a century. They have said for a long time that no republican government could endure for a great while; that our own system was a very good one for such men as Washington and Franklin and Adams and Jefferson, but to give unbridled liberty to the mass of the people would make all stable or just government absolutely and forever impossible. They will come here to witness the great achievements which have been brought about during this period, remembering as they do, even better than ourselves, the events of this great war, and to hear the shouts at the close of this first grand centenary of our country of a whole people in joyous congratulation for the restoration of peace and with it the restoration of prosperity, and with both a restoration of hope in the hearts of oppressed nations elsewhere, for the ultimate and universal liberty of the human race.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY.]

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to refer briefly to the effect of a provision of the reconstruction acts of Congress which created the necessity for the various measures of relief from political disabilities which have since followed. I refer to the provision prohibiting those who had held office prior to the war from holding office, while they were clothed with the fullest power as voters. If it was proper that those lately in rebellion should be made voters, there should have been no disability to hold office. If they were dangerous as office-holders, they were dangerous as voters; for the power is in the ballot. The reconstruction measures, to become operative, supposed and required the presence of a loyal political element in the South, and contemplated that only this element, in the initial stages of reconstruction, should exercise political functions; hence political disabilities were imposed upon parties believed to be devoid of the feeling of loyalty to the Government and institutions of the country. The specifications of causes of disability were more thorough and far-reaching in their effect than many supposed, and kept out of political life not only the leaders in the rebellion but a multitude of thoughtful men who, under the circumstances which surrounded them, gave the rebellion their support after the war commenced, many, however, giving no more support than that involved in the sympathy felt for relatives and neighbors in the field, with the exception of that very very few who remained steadfast in their loyalty to the Union; and all honor be to that gallant little band. There were in those portions of the South continuously within the lines of the confederacy almost nobody who did not give aid, comfort, or sympathy to the rebellion in some shape or other. Many prominent citizens of that portion of the South to which I refer were Union men at the outbreak of the rebellion. They opposed by vote and voice the secession of their States and exerted all their power and influence to prevent the precipitation of those States into rebellion. That they failed in their efforts is a matter of history; and after the war commenced and as it progressed, their sympathies very naturally went out to their sons, brothers, and friends who were in the field battling for what they thought was a righteous cause.

Now, this class of men, whose services would have been of great value in the work of reconstruction in the South because of their experience in the affairs of government, were disabled through the fact that they had held office prior to the war.

This was a singularly unfortunate provision of the reconstruction acts, enacted by a Congress actuated, in my judgment, by the very best of motives, but having a scant knowledge of the results to be obtained from a practical application of these provisions.

In attempting to apply these measures in the establishment of local governments in the South, we found this provision of the law to be not only unpopular and singularly unfortunate in its application, but very hurtful to good government, and calculated to obstruct rather than facilitate the object contemplated in these measures of re-adjustment. We found that those who were deprived of political privileges were not and had not been more disloyal than others whom subordinate positions in southern politics had protected from disabilities, who had less general intelligence and experience in affairs, but were eligible to any office to which they might be elected. I think I can safely state that as a rule we found the class laboring under disabilities to be the more thoughtful and conservative element in southern communites; that they were not only more influential and intelligent than the young or new political leaders, who under the operation of the provision of the law referred to had obtained prominence and leadership, but that they more heartily and intelligently than any other class appreciated and accepted the settled results of the war, and could be most helpful and useful in securing good order in society and the return of fraternal feelings between the people of the two sections of country so lately in conflict.

A still further embarrassment resulted from the restlessness and discontent engendered by the proscription of this class in the minds of the people of the South generally, and furnished an opportunity for the display of the most mischievous arts of the demagogues who began to come into political power or prominence.

To those of us who have had to deal with this question practically the difficulties of the situation presented themselves, and have continued to force themselves upon our attention, and have challenged whatever ambition we may have had in the direction of practical statesmanship in dealing with this question. The republicans of the South early foresaw the irritation that had been produced and that would continue to plague the body-politic so long as these disabilities remained imposed upon certain classes of the people of the South. From daily contact and asssociation with the people in the various relations of life, those who like myself had made their homes in the South since the war had the conviction forced upon us at an early day that the sooner all distinctions then existing in the country and created by the provisions of the reconstruction acts should be swept away, the better it would be for the good of the whole country.

We found that, with the exception of the very small number of people who had remained loyal in sentiment in the cotton States, the very best element of the male population of the South—mark you, I say the very best element of that population—was the "soldier" element, the men who had gone to the tented field, believing as religiously in the majority of cases that they were right as we believed them to be wrong; those who had been bred in any political school having been from childhood deeply inoculated with the doctrine of "States rights"—these men, I say, who had braved the perils of the field, the march, disease, and hunger, and who fought as only Americans can fight, with the exception I have named, were the best element of the southern people.

The balance of the male population besides the colored people was composed, first, of those too old for war; second, of those too cowardly to fight, who were known as "mossy-backed rangers" during the war, but came out fully-fledged "Union men" after the war, ready to take the "iron-clad" or any other oath so they got office thereby, and who have been a greater plague to the republican party of the South than almost all other evils combined; third, of those pestiferous demagogues who invited secession and rebellion, promised to put down the war in ninety days, to drink individually all the blood that might be shed, and who when the conflict came had such urgent business at home that they had no leisure to go to the field. This being the condition of things, we came to the conclusion that, even viewed from the narrow stand-point of party, it was desirable to go to the extremest limit of liberality in blotting from existence all provisions of law which gave to demagogues any opportunity for creating or perpetuating strife by sympathetic appeals in behalf of those who were proscribed; while, viewed from the broad national stand-point of a desire to cultivate a spirit of forgetfulness of the bitterness and the sorrow that was the legacy of the war, it seemed to us to be the only course dictated by wisdom and patriotism.

Hence it will be found that the republicans of the South are in favor of, and have been the earliest and most earnest advocates of, the removal of all disabilities and in favor of repealing all legislation, so far as it can be done safely, that serves as a reminder of the era of war.

It may be said, it has been said, that, notwithstanding the magnanimity shown to those lately in rebellion, the South has been turbulent; proscription and ostracism, yea, violence and assassination of republicans, both white and black, have been rampant throughout some portions of the South. While I am bound to admit that this is only too true, and while I would invoke the fullest extent of the power of this nation to punish crime and protect its humblest citizen in the fullest enjoyment of all his civil and political rights, I respectfully submit that it is bad policy and worse statesmanship to attempt by any plan of substitution to make one man or one class of men bear the punishment for crimes committed by others.

It may be thought by some of those around me that the policy of magnaminity has borne but little fruit in the South. Let us not, though admitting this to be true, jump to the conclusion that the seed sown has fallen upon a rock; it has borne some good fruit, and I believe will soon bear more. Setting aside the abstract question of the right or wrong of the rebellion, let us not forget that thousands of hearts at the South as well as at the North have been made to bleed by the results of the war; wives, mothers, fathers, sisters, and brothers, as innocent of all responsibility for the war as the same number of mourners at the North, will mourn for the balance of their days amid broken hearth-stones and ruined fortunes for the loved ones and the lost who will never, never return.

The President of the United States in a late message pronounces for amnesty. The first Legislature that sat in Louisiana since reconstruction, overwhelmingly republican, proposed and placed before the people of the State, at the first general election thereafter, a constitutional amendment removing all political disabilities to hold office imposed by our State constitution. That Legislature, composed largely of colored men, passed unanimously a bill, which I had the honor to introduce, appropriating $5,000 to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, that being estimated as the share properly due by Louisiana, estimated by the number of dead confederates buried there who went to the war from Louisiana for the purpose of erecting a monument to the confederate dead who fell in Virginia. These colored men knew that these men died while battling for a confederacy "the corner-stone of which was to be human slavery." I quote the illustrious gentleman from Georgia, late vice-president of the confederacy. But they were willing to forgive and to try to forget. The republican party of Louisiana, and I think also of Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and South Carolina, has pronounced through its State conventions for general amnesty. My republican colleagues, with myself, in the Forty-first, Forty-second, and Forty-third Congresss, have voted for general amnesty.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that a new era of prosperity is about to dawn on the South in common with the rest of the country. I believe the best minds of the South already comprehend that its future prosperity depends on its being in harmony with the balance of the country by the development of its manufactures as well as of its agriculture; by its procuring a fair share of the internal improvements of the country, prosecuted at the national expense; by the building of railroads and the development of its mines. This, coupled with an invitation to capital and immigration through a determination to give the amplest protection to life, property, and free opinion, will give new life and new growth to the South. I am glad that I am able to say that this is the belief of a large majority of the republican Representives from the South in this House, and that they see no reason to turn back in the path they have hitherto trod in dealing with this question.

Believing that the results will vindicate my judgment, I shall vote for the removal of all disabilities now imposed, so that even the last officially connecting link with the bitter memories and sorrows of the late civil war may be broken, and the memories and sorrows, so far as may be possible, forgotten in the fullness of the glory and good-will of the centennial year of the Republic.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. TARBOX.]

Mr. TARBOX. Mr. Speaker, I had wished to speak in this debate, in order that the old State of Massachusetts, front of the foremost to enter the field for the Union, should not fail to utter here her aspiration for a universal amnesty to every son of America. But, sir, after that message of Massachusetts had been spoken to this House and to the country so eloquently, so justly, by my distinguished colleague, [Mr. BANKS,] it would have been my pleasure to have kept silent. Why, sir, he has sent back to their infernal abode, rebuked, the gaunt and gory specters which the gentleman from Maine, like some magician of the black art, with devilish incantation, had called up here from the political inferno to mar the fair form of the festal cheer of the Republic.

Only a few months ago a scene transpired in the streets of Boston which was as potent in its spell upon the conscience and heart of Massachusetts as was the light that shone upon Saul in his journey to Damascus. On the 17th of June of immortal, ever-precious memory, through the streets of Boston, amid the acclaims of countless thousands, marched shoulder to shoulder, as brothers sworn, the soldiers of Maryland, of Virginia, of South Carolina, the honored and welcome guests of the old Commonwealth, with the soldiers of Massachusetts, to the patriot shrine of Bunker Hill, and there, under the shadow of that shaft which lifts its head to heaven, they consecrated anew the union of the Republic [Applause.] And by the side, sir, of the palmetto tree which the soldiers of South Carolina brought from its native soil and planted beside the pine, on that sacred spot, an emblem of re-union, the people of the North struck hands with the people of the South in pledge of eternal amity and declared on that altar sacred to a common glory that not alone from the statute-book of the nation, but equally from the hearts of the people, should be razed forever all memorials of our unhappy feud.

That, sir, is the voice of Massachusetts to-day. We come here to make offer of no partial amnesty, that shall spoil the grace and the nobility of it, but amnesty full, complete, universal, like that illimitable grace which God gives to the sinful children of his infinite love.

Now, sir, to the question itself. The gentleman from Maine confuses the significance of the amnesty this bill intends. What is it? It does not contemplate any condonation of murder. It is not a pardon of any offense which he charges singularly upon Jefferson Davis. We do not forgive murder, if murder is done. Amnesty, sir, and the terms of the bill clearly express it, is simply the removal of disabilities imposed upon Jefferson Davis by reason of his having engaged in insurrection. It forgives no other crime. It relieves from no penalty the law may inflict. What justifies the imposing of political disabilities in a republic? Only one thing justifies it, and that, sir, is the public safety; and I would have had the gentleman from Maine tell us what peril to the public safety is menaced by the imposition of the political disability that rests upon Jefferson Davis. He says he would not punish him. But he says, what? That he would refuse this amnesty, because by it this body declares that he is worthy to fill the highest offices of the Republic. Sir, the gentleman knows, or ought to know, that this bill has no such significance. It pronounces no opinion upon his worthiness. Suppose, sir, the gentleman from Maine was under some legal disability to hold office from any cause and a proposition was submitted here to remove that disability, would he like that test applied? Would he ask that this body should refuse relief unless it judged him fit, capable, and worthy to be President of these United States? Such a test might, sir, somewhat imperil his chances of the amnesty he sought. [Laughter.]

It is not, sir, of great importance in a personal sense whether Jefferson Davis is or is not excluded from the benefits of this perpetual pledge of peace, but it is to the country. It is important in this aspect that upon the statute-books of the nation shall remain no monument to perpetuate memories that the patriotic genius of the nation would shroud in the oblivion of a generous forgetfulness. And the hope thrills the great popular heart that, when the nation assembles under the old flag, on which every star is set in its place, to enter upon its new century of life, under the shadow of its folds shall stand no slave, and no man who does not stand erect with no brand on his brow, clothed in the full panoply of American citizenship and manhood, with privileges commensurate with its responsibilities.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Maine in opening his remarks this morning held me to a responsibility in having introduced this bill which, if true, is a grave one. He charges that I am responsible for all this discussion which has engendered so much bad feeling. Let us for a moment examine the truth or falsity of that assertion. In doing so I have to state that in introducing this bill I introduced a bill identical in its entire substance, word for word, with that which I find the gentleman from Maine himself had concurred in as a member of the Committee on Rules at the last session of Congress. At that time he did not come to the front with his hate and venom. At that time, perhaps, he occupied a relatively different position from what he occupies now. During the entire period of the war, while I was a member of this House with him, I was his peer in urging every measure which proposed to prosecute the war for the restoration of the Union and to secure peace throughout the length and breadth of this land. We began, however, to diverge subsequently to the date of the surrender at Appomattox Court-house. I began from that moment to look for the enactment of measures having for their object the peace of the country and the restoration of harmony throughout all the States, while he pursued a course of legislation calculated to irritate and to keep alive the hate and the passions of the civil war.

And to-day I present this measure and ask its adoption in the spirit of the resolution offered the other day by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW]—

Resolved, That the fraternal feeling and good-will now existing in all sections of the United States, and the manifest disposition and purpose of the men who battled against each other, in the late civil war, to join hands as one people in the future is a most auspicious ushering in of the centennial year; and while the people are thus making an honest effort to live together in peace and uphold the same flag for an undivided country, their representatives in Congress should do no act which will unnecessarily disturb the patriotic concord now existing and increasing, or wantonly revive the bitter memories of the past—which, on a call of the yeas and nays, the gentleman from Maine voted for, although he has so signally failed to show the sincerity of that vote. Amnesty, to be of any value, must be sincere. It has, to my mind, an unimportant effect upon the individuals immediately benefited. I want that this amnesty shall touch the heart and enter the mind of every man throughout the length and breadth of our country. I want that we shall have an end of war, and of these political warfares. I want peace too. And, unlike the gentleman from Maine, who rubs the sore when he should bring the plaster, I ask in the words of General Grant, and I commend these words to the gentleman with emphasis, "Let us have peace."

I know not what is the object of the gentleman from Maine, for it is not my province to inquire into his motives, but his conduct leads to but one conclusion in my mind, and that is that his ambition makes it necessary that he shall ride into some higher place upon the bad feelings which may be excited among the people of this country. An appeal to the bad passions of men is unworthy of the gentleman and unworthy of this representative body.

I have in no particular sought to do in this debate anything that would either cut off debate or prevent a fair expression of sentiment, but if I had, I am reminded of the conduct of the gentleman from Maine himself when, as the author of the two infamous rules, he crushed this side and forced upon the statute-book the civil-rights bill; nay, more, when in the adoption of those rules he sought to enable and did succeed in enabling this House to pass the infamous force bill, calculated not to give amnesty to anybody but to allow the iron tread of the soldier to subjugate four sovereign Commonwealths of this Union.

Now, it does not become the gentleman in that particular to say aught here. Nay, more, the gentleman here to-day, in attempting to hold me in the least degree responsible for this bad feeling, knows perfectly well when he utters such a sentiment that he in no manner expresses either my feelings or any words which have ever passed my lips.

I desire, in conclusion, to say that I bring this measure forward in no spirit of partisanship. I believe, if ever I had in my life a patriotic emotion, that it is a patriotic emotion alone which prompts me now in offering amnesty in this centennial year to all the people. I tell the gentleman from Maine that he little understands the sentiment of the people if he again in any way attempts to interfere with their wish and their will in this respect. And if he does it he will have an opportunity, as he expressed it a moment ago, of hanging his head before the American people.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? [Cries of "No! "No!" on the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAINE. What are the two "infamous rules" to which you refer?

Mr. RANDALL. I allude to the rules adopted by the last House, and which this House, to its honor in contrast with the conduct of the last House, repealed.

Mr. BLAINE. What are the rules?

Mr. RANDALL. Crushing out the rights of the minority on this floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Name the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Rules 166 and 167.

Mr. BLAINE. What did they provide?

Mr. RANDALL. Read them. [Laughter and applause.] You know them, for you wrote them yourself.

Mr. BLAINE. The first of those rules the gentleman is on record as supporting and helping to pass. The first rule you supported yourself, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask unanimous consent for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to offer his amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I object to that, and for this reason——[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask to have the amendment read.

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I send it up to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the gentleman's hour had expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Not quite. I always give myself a margin. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the seventh line of the first section of his bill and insert instead of the words stricken out these words:

"And shall be forever relieved therefrom upon their appearing before a judge of any court of the United States or any court of record of the State in which they are resident and taking and subscribing the following oath, to be duly attested and recorded, to wit: I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same, and obey all laws made in pursuance thereof, and that I take this obligation freely and without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion whatever."

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to make a proposition, which I think will meet with no objection on this side?

Mr. RANDALL. After mine is disposed of I will hear you.

Mr. KASSON. That, I understand, is disposed of by the objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I object to it.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will hear you.

Mr. KASSON. With the gentleman's permission I suggest, in order to arrive at a result which I think the gentleman will foresee, that he accept the amendment already offered by the gentleman from Maine as a substitute for the bill with the privilege of moving to strike out the objectionable words in that proposition, then a vote of the House may be taken on that clause, which a simple majority will determine. That being done, he can bring the House to a vote upon the general amnesty substantially as proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and the whole question can be disposed of to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. I have met the only serious objection—the only one that is of any possible value—from that side of the House in accepting the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] I am now, by the act of the gentleman from Maine, who has precipitated this discussion, or the angry part of it, upon this House, driven to the sole resource of moving to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report it, back with the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. KASSON. It was to avoid that necessity that I made my proposition, and also I desire to amend one clause of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is upon the passage of the bill which was rejected and reconsidered. Pending which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report it back with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS;] and upon that motion he moves the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on committing the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report it back with the amendment at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I did not say that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is necessary that the Chair should understand the gentleman's motion. It would be manifestly impossible for a committee to report it back forthwith.

Mr. RANDALL. That is, unless by unanimous consent. But I propose, after the House has carried this motion, to appeal again to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and ask him to allow it to be reported back forthwith.

Mr. BLAINE. No one cares about the reference to a committee; the gentleman need not make any point on that; no one cares about it at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the question now before the House is the motion to commit the pending bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report the same back with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

The motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted to report that bill and amendment forthwith.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has persistently refused to allow this side of the House to offer any amendment. His proposition now I would say, if I did not feel so kindly disposed toward him, seems to be trifling with the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I think you are trifling with the House.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course I object to the whole proceeding; it is evasive.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. As one member of that committee, I desire that we should have at least a few minutes' opportunity to consider the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. I never classified you with the opponents of amnesty.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I am not an opponent of amnesty; but I object to pushing any measure through the House after it has been r ferred to a committee without giving that committee an opportunity to consider and report it properly.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to reconsider the vote referring this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that. The Committee on the Judiciary will have an opportunity to report the next time committees are called, which will probably be to-morrow.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at sixteen minutes past three o'clock.

Mr. COX. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before submitting the motion to adjourn, the Chair will submit several requests for the withdrawal of papers, &c.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Leave was asked, and obtained, to withdraw papers from the files of the House, as follows:

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. COX. I now insist on my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 14, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF RECORD.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a question of privilege, and I hope I may be heard at this time, as I certainly was not yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question, and the House will preserve order.

Mr. MILLS. On yesterday, when I interrupted the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] in his remarks, the reporter failed to catch either my words or the idea I intended to convey. The language attributed to me might justly be regarded by the gentleman from Maine as offensive to him. It is not the language I used. I am reported as saying "I trust we are not to be put upon record as assenting by our silence to such a falsehood." The imputation would seem to be that I was charging the gentleman from Maine with uttering a falsehood. What I intended to say and what I did say was that the gentleman from Maine had no right to infer from our silence, as he had said in his previous remarks he would, that if we did not interrupt him he would assume that we assented to his proposition, because such silence on our part might be construed as an assent to what might be a falsehood; that is what I said.

PAPER FOR PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 236) to amend section 3767 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the purchase of paper for the public printing, be taken from the Speaker's table and considered at the present time.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to give notice that I shall object to every request for unanimous consent unless we can first have the privilege of hearing the matter proposed to be brought up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is very proper. The bill will be read for information, after which objection may be made.

The bill was read. It provides that section 3767 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so that it will read as follows:

The Joint Committee on Public Printing shall fix upon standards of paper for the different descriptions of public printing; and the Congressional Printer shall, under their direction, advertise in two newspapers published in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Cincinnati, for sealed proposals to furnish the Government with paper as specified in the schedule to be furnished to applicants by the Congressional Printer, setting forth in detail the quality and quantities required for the public printing; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been considered by two committees: the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House; and it has met with the unanimous approval of those committees. It has for its object the saving of money which the committees think has been unnecessarily expended in publishing long advertisements in twelve newspapers in six different cities. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Unless the Chair hears objection this bill will be considered as read three times and passed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

A number of the committees having been called, and no reports presented.

The SPEAKER. Without calling through all the other committees in detail, the Chair will take the liberty of asking whether any gentleman from any committee has any private bill to report?

Mr. RUSK. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has some business to report.

The SPEAKER. That committee will be heard now.

ALEXANDER ST. BERNARD.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard, of Saint Clair County, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ADMINISTRATIVE ECONOMY AND REFORM.

The SPEAKER. There being no further reports of private bills, the next business in order is the call of committees for general business.

Mr. MORRISON. The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom were referred sundry resolutions in relation to inquiry into abuses which may exist in the several departments of the public service, have instructed me to report a substitute for those resolutions and to ask its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the several committees of this House having in charge matters pertaining to appropriations, foreign affairs, Indian affairs, military affairs, naval affairs, post-office and post-roads, public lands, public buildings and grounds, claims and war claims, be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, so far as the same may properly be before their respective committees, into any errors, abuses, or frauds that may exist in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting said branches of the public service, with a view to ascertain what change and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein; that the Committees on Expenditures in the State Department, in the Treasury Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, in the Post-Office Department, in the Interior Department, in the Department of Justice, and on Public Buildings, be, and they are hereby instructed, to proceed at once, as required by the rules of the House, to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures of the respective Departments submitted to them, and to examine and report particularly whether the expenditures of the respective Departments are justified by law; whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amount; whether any, and what, retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments, without detriment to the public service; whether any, and what, abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others, and to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several Departments and the accountability of their officers; whether any offices belonging to the branches or Departments, respectively, concerning whose expenditures it is their duty to inquire, have become useless or unnecessary; and to report from time to time on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also to examine into the pay and emoluments of all officers under the laws of the United States and to report from time to time such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require. And for the purpose of enabling the several committees to fully comprehend the workings of the various branches or Departments of Government, respectively, the investigations of said committees may cover such period in the past as each of said committees may deem necessary for its own guidance or information or for the protection of the public interests, in the exposing of frauds or abuses of any kind that may exist in said Departments; and said committees are authorized to send for persons and papers, and may report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate and inquire into the matters set forth in the foregoing resolutions in the legislative departments of the Government, except in so far as the Senate is exclusively concerned; and particularly in reference to the public printing and binding, and shall have the same authority that is conferred upon the other committees aforesaid.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether this is a substitute for the resolutions originally referred to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. MORRISON. The original resolutions referred to the Committee on Ways and Means did not include the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Foreign Affairs among the committees ordered to make these investigations, and in the resolutions now before the House reported from the Committee on Ways and Means those two committees are included.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. This, then, is a substitute for those resolutions, containing amendments suggested by the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. MORRISON. The resolutions include the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Foreign Affairs among the committees ordered to institute these investigations. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was agreed to, and then the resolutions, as amended, were adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S SALARY.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back bill (H. R. No. 281) reducing the salary of the President of the United States after the 4th of March, 1877, and repealing section 153, chapter 2, Revised Statutes, which was inadvertently referred to that committee, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES W. BUTTON.

Mr. TUCKER. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back bill (H. R. No. 433) to pay to Charles W. Button the costs of advertising property levied on by the collector of United States internal revenue in the fifth district of the State of Virginia, which had been inadvertently referred to that committee. I may say that the committee would have found no difficulty in reporting back the bill favorably but for the question of jurisdiction. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

REGISTERED VESSELS.

Mr. WARD, of New York, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1051) to provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned or built; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the hailing-place of every registered, enrolled, or licensed vessel of the United States, as provided in section 4178 and section 4334 of the Revised Statutes of the United States may hereafter be the town or city where said vessel is built, or where the husband or managing owner of said vessel shall reside; and the name of such town or city shall be painted on the stern of said vessel in the manner and subject to the penalties provided in said sections.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be put on its passage at this time. By section 4178 of the Revised Statutes of the United States it is provided that—

The name of every registered vessel, and of the port to which she shall belong, shall be painted on her stern, on a black ground, in white letters, of not less than three inches in length. If any vessel of the United States shall be found without having her name and the name of the port to which she belongs so painted, the owner or owners shall be liable to a penalty of $50; recoverable one-half to the person giving the information thereof; the other half to the use of the United States.

Section 4334 provides that—

Every licensed vessel shall have her name, and the port to which she belongs, painted on her stern, in the manner prescribed for registered vessels; and if any licensed vessel be found without such painting, the owner thereof shall be liable to a penalty of $20.

Now, sir, a custom has grown up under those sections of the Revised Statutes by which the owners of many vessels have simply painted the name and place where the vessel was built. Recently, however, a construction has been given by the Treasury Department that the place should be the port of entry. The subject has been brought to the attention of the Committee on Commerce, and after careful consideration we see no objection to the passage of this bill. In order, however, to be certain that the custom has existed, and ascertain whether any objection exists to this proposed change, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, to which he made the following reply:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 8, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a communication of the 7th instant from Hon. Elijah Ward, transmitting, by direction of the committee, bill No. 1, to provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned. And the Department is asked what has been the custom under and the construction given to the section of the Revised Statutes of the United States referred to in the bill, and if any objection exists to the form of the bill and its passage by Congress.

Under section 4178 of the Revised Statutes, the section which the bill cites, a practice had grown up in some customs districts of painting the name of the hailing-place on the stern of vessels, which was the place where the vessels had been built; and it was held to be a substantial compliance with the law. The Department only enforced the penalty in cases where there had been an omission to put on the vessel her name and hailing-place. But it was decided recently that the name of the port where the ship's papers were issued is the proper hailing-place and should appear on the vessel's stern.

The Department has, however, in compliance with the request of the committee, carefully considered the bill submitted. Another section of the Revised Statutes, 4334, has been added, and the amendments suggested, as shown in the accompanying draft of a bill, are designed to accomplish the object in view, namely, to enable owners to have painted on the stern of their vessels either the name of the hailing-place or home port, whichever may be preferred; and to this I see no objection. The title of the amended bill is: "To provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned or built."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Hon. FRANK HEREFORD,
Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the committee see no objection to the passage of the bill. The custom having grown up and having prevailed, it would be much more satisfactory to sections of the country where the vessels are built or where the owners reside to have that place on the vessel rather than to have the port of entry. Therefore, if no one desires to speak on the subject, I will move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. WARD. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF ERROR IN REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SAYLER. I am directed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report a bill to correct an error in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, and to recommend its passage. It is a mere correction of a clerical error in section 2403 of the Revised Statutes, in which section 2401 is quoted as "section 2407," and there is added a saving clause as to the rights of settlers.

The bill (H. R. No. 1052) was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that for the purpose of correcting an error in the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st December, 1873," so as to make the same truly express such laws, the following amendment is thereby made therein:

Section 2403 is amended by striking out in the second line the word "seven" and inserting the word "one;" and all credits to settlers for moneys deposited by them for surveys of lands as provided by section 2401 allowed since the date of the approval of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby declared to be legal.

Mr. KASSON. I have not understood the object of the bill from the reading of it. I hope there will be some explanation given.

Mr. SAYLER. The purpose of the bill is to correct an error on page 443, in section 2403, of the Revised Statutes. In the second line of that section occur the words "section two thousand four hundred and seven." It should read section "two thousand four hundred and one," section 2407 having no reference whatever to the purpose of section 2403. Then there is a saving clause appended, which simply protects the rights of settlers in the payments they have made during the time that this error has existed in the revision. That is all there is of the bill. It is a mere correction of a clerical error.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. SAYLER. In further explanation of the bill I ask that a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 21, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to a manifest error in the Revised Statutes of the United States, on page 443, section 2403. In the second line of this section occur the words "section twenty-four hundred and seven," which should read "section twenty-four hundred and one," section 2401 being the section that provides for the depositing by settlers of the expenses of the survey of the lands settled upon by them, and section 2407 being entirely inapplicable to the case.

I therefore submit herewith a bill to correct this apparent error, and at the same time provide for relieving this office from any embarrassment by legalizing its action in continuing to allow deposits by settlers for surveys to go in part payment for their lands before said error in the revision was discovered.

Without such a curative act it would become necessary for this office to call on those settlers who have been allowed credits for deposits for survey since the approval of the Revised Statutes to pay over to the Government again the amounts thus allowed before patents could be issued to them.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. S. BURDETT,
Commissioner.

Hon. MILTON SAYLER,
Chairman of Committee on the Public Lands, House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY RESERVATION AT FORT KEARNEY.

Mr. CROUNSE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 172) providing for settlement upon the lands known as the Fort Kearney military reservation in the State of Nebraska.

The bill, which was read, sets forth in its preamble that the military reservation at Fort Kearney, in the State of Nebraska, has been formally abandoned by the military authorities, and provides that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and instructed to cause said reservation to be surveyed, and the same shall be open to pre-emption and homestead entry, under the conditions, restrictions, and stipulations contained in the laws relating to pre-emption and homestead entry, respectively.

Mr. CROUNSE. I have to say in respect to this bill that it relates to a small piece of land away in the interior of Nebraska which formerly formed a military reservation. It is distant two hundred miles from the Missouri River. It has been turned over formally by the military authorities to the jurisdiction of the Land Office. It has on it no buildings of account, and has no more value than the surrounding lands. This bill provides that this reservation shall be open to entry in the same way as other public lands in Nebraska. I presume there will be no objection to it. If any occurs to any gentleman I will give opportunity to state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Nebraska will consent to strike out the words "pre-emption and," leaving only the provisions of the homestead law to apply.

Mr. KASSON. I had risen to call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska to precisely that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. This pre-emption system is favorable to speculators and against the rights of bona fide settlers, and ought not to be perpetuated. I hope the gentleman will allow a motion to strike out the words I have indicated.

Mr. CROUNSE. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana would meet with my entire approbation so far as I am personally concerned; but having been instructed by the committee to report the bill in its present shape, I do not feel authorized to consent to that amendment being made.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman not allow it to be offered and voted upon?

Mr. CROUNSE. Unless some member of the committee objects, I will undertake to speak for it, and allow the amendment to be offered or accepted.

Mr. GOODIN. As one member of the committee I have no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out, wherever they occur, the words, "pre-emption and."

Mr. CROUNSE. I accept that amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the bill as now amended be again reported.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be regarded as agreed to by the House.

The Chair hears none; and the Clerk will now read the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the military reservation at Fort Kearney, in the State of Nebraska, has been formally abandoned by the military authorities: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and instructed to cause said reservation to be surveyed, and the same shall be open to homestead entry, under the conditions, restrictions, and stipulations contained in the law relating to homestead entry.

Mr. FORT. I would like to hear the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE] explain to the House how large this reservation is and how near any large town. If it is near any large town, it will be better to have it surveyed and sold at auction. If only two or three settlers can get upon it, it will be very valuable land.

Mr. CROUNSE. I said before that this land is in the interior of Nebraska, about two hundred miles from the Missouri River. It is surrounded by lands which have been lately settled upon under the pre-emption and homestead laws. I do not understand that any portion of it is more valuable than the lands surrounding it. It is not of the most valuable lands we have in Nebraska. Some portions of it are quite sandy, and I know of nothing which renders it more valuable than any of the public lands lying open to pre-emption and homestead entry in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. FORT. How large is the tract?

Mr. CROUNSE. About ten miles square.

Mr. RUSK. Are there any settlers on the land now?

Mr. CROUNSE. I do not know about that.

Mr. RUSK. If there be any on there their rights should be protected.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask if there are any buildings on the land—any fort?

Mr. CROUNSE. I understand that there are none of any value. This land has not been used as a military reservation for many years, and there is nothing on it, as I understand, of any value whatever.

Mr. FORT. I would like to know if the Committee on Military Affairs have any objection to the bill or not.

Mr. SAYLER. The Committee on Military Affairs have nothing to do with it.

Mr. CROUNSE. This reservation, as will be seen by a letter of the Secretary of War to Congress of December, 1874, has been abandoned by the Military Department and turned over to the Interior Department.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CROUNSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISPOSITION OF PUBLIC LANDS IN CERTAIN STATES.

Mr. MOREY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 238) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida.

The bill was read. It provides that section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, confining the disposal of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida to the provisions of the homestead law, be repealed; and that the act shall take effect at the expiration of ninety days from the date of its passage.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, I will make a brief explanation of the necessity of the passage of this bill. In the year 1866 an act was passed providing that lands in these States mentioned in the bill—Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida—should be subject to the pre-emption and homestead acts only. I do not think that any good reason has ever existed why lands in these States should be subject to rules as to their disposal that lands in other States are not subject to. That is the view of the delegations from those States respectively, and it is the unanimous opinion of the Committee on the Public Lands. And this bill merely proposes to repeal that special legislation which places those lands in a different position from any other public lands in the country. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire very much that no distinction shall exist between these five States and the other States and Territories of the Union on this subject; but I desire the law applicable to these five States to be spread over the entire landed property of the Union. The reason why I beg the attention of the House to this question now is that repeated efforts have been made on this floor—among others, I have introduced a bill heretofore in the last Congress which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands—proposing that the homestead law may be the exclusive authority by which lands of the United States may be acquired.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Did not such a bill pass the last House?

Mr. KASSON. I do not now remember, but gentlemen around me assure me that it did pass the House at the last session. And I beg permission of the House, as many gentlemen are here now who were not present in the discussion on that question, to call attention to the fact that we have endeavored persistently for years to so arrange the remaining lands of the United States that the men who will till and cultivate them shall alone be entitled to acquire them from the United States.

As I have already stated, and repeat now, speculators of great wealth in the East have for forty or fifty years been absorbing the best lands in the country, so that the immigrant, when he endeavors to find a new home for himself and his children, finds that the title is held at a great distance, inaccessible to him, and at a price beyond his means. That ought to be amended. As good lands are rapidly disappearing from the power of the immigrant, I appeal to the House to take no step backward from the position that has already been taken, but rather that we may hope from this Committee on the Public Lands a favorable report which shall extend the homestead law exclusively as a means of acquiring public lands from the United States. Hence I beg we may not remove that principle from the four States named in this bill, but rather extend it over every State in the Union.

One single word more for the consideration of my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY.] It is well known that in those States there is a population which everybody desires to make industrious, which everybody wishes to see as soon as possible adding to the productive wealth of that region of the country. Let these freedmen, then, who have not so much means, and in regard to whom the desire exists to so great a degree that they may have settled rights and property interests to protect—let them continue to have the right to obtain possession of these lands under the simple provisions of the homestead law and for the slight expense involved in that law. For these reasons I greatly hope that this report of the committee will not be adopted by the House, but that we will wait further consideration from that committee of a proposition to extend the same principle over the whole United States.

Mr. MOREY. I think I am authorized to say that the sentiment of the Committee on the Public Lands is this: They are in favor of going to the fullest extent for the protection of the rights of the settlers upon the public lands. We have now in the hands of a subcommittee a measure prepared with a view of throwing still greater restrictions about the disposal of the public lands of the country. That was a part of a general bill that passed this House in the last session of Congress by an almost unanimous vote. First, it removes all restrictions imposed by special legislation; then it repeals the pre-emption acts, and throws greater safeguards around the homestead act.

But while the committee are disposed to protect fully the rights of the settler, they see no good reason, nor has the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] advanced any good reason, why these States should be subject to any special legislation in this regard.

In regard to the protection of the newly-enfranchised citizens, I desire to say that there are large bodies of public lands which are and have been open to their entry under the homestead act, and they have availed themselves of it to some slight degree. They will still have power, under the provisions of the general law which still remains in force, to avail themselves, equally with all other classes of citizens, of the provisions of the homestead act. But in the interest of the Government, which we should seek to protect in this matter, we have thought the passage of this bill necessary.

In the southwestern portion of the State of Louisiana notably there are large tracts of heavily-timbered land. Under the operation of this special legislation, this act of 1866, the Government cannot sell that timbered land; it cannot be pre-empted. The consequence is this: speculators engaged largely in the lumbering business have erected saw-mills upon that Government land, and by the aid of their employés have made entries under the homestead act. The fee required for a homestead I think is $15. Before three months have passed after that entry is made, that land, so valuable for timber, is thoroughly despoiled of every stick of timber on it, and it is then abandoned. There is no effort to prove up title by the settler, and it is an invitation to perjury and the procuration of perjury on the part of those whose cupidity leads them to despoil the lands of the Government for their private gain.

Now, while the Committee on the Public Lands is, I think, disposed, as this House is, to throw every safeguard upon the disposition of the Government land and to go to the fullest extent in the protection of the rights of the settler, still I fail to see any reason why the disposition of the lands in these four States should be left under the operation of any special law. A general law that applies to the disposition of the lands of all the other States is good enough for us in those States. We do not ask any special legislation for our benefit. There is nobody from those States, so far as I am aware, asking for it. There never has been any protest from those States against the passage of this bill. On the contrary, within my knowledge, we have had repeatedly within the last four years petition after petition asking that this legislation which we now propose should be had. I will now ask the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WALLS. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. MOREY. I will yield first to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. GOODIN,] and then I will yield to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WALLS.]

Mr. GOODIN. I am not willing, Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee which reports this bill, to rest under any implied imputation that the Committee on the Public Lands is opposed to the opening up of the remaining undisposed public domain of the country through the beneficent operations of the homestead laws to actual settlers. In reporting this bill, which seems to apply to but a small area of territory in the South, it was not deemed proper by the committee to ingraft in it any provision or to report at this time any measure in reference to the opening of the public domain under the operation of the homestead law.

With my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I too am in favor, so far as the remaining public lands of the United States are concerned, be they situated where they may, of opening them up for entry under the homestead laws. But gentlemen will remember that, so far as the recommendations of this committee are concerned and so far as the provisions of this bill extend, we propose only that the public lands in the South shall be disposed of in the same manner that the public lands in the West and elsewhere in the United States are disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. GOODIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has not the tendency of legislation for a number of years been so to arrange our land laws that the whole of the public lands remaining shall come under the provision of the homestead law for actual settlers, instead of being subject to claims, either fraudulent or not, and to spoliation by speculators? And would not the repeal of this limitation apply to the homesteading of forty acres of land in the States named, and open up the land in those States to pre-emption instead of reserving them as now, and as we propose to do with reference to all the States and Territories, for the exclusive benefit of settlers? Is not this a step away from the system of homestead settlement and in favor of the system of speculation in the public lands, which should not be the subject of speculation under any circumstances whatever?

Mr. GOODIN. Such was not the purpose of the committee. I have no doubt in the world (though I am not authorized on this point to speak for the committee) that the Committee on the Public Lands will report favorably a bill opening the remaining portion of the public domain to the operation of the homestead law. But so far as the provisions of this bill go, it provides only that there shall be no exception in favor of the lands in the South. The next step forward, so far as the committee are concerned, will be to declare that all the public lands in the United States shall be opened up to entry under the provisions of the homestead law. If I thought for a moment that the effect of the passage of this bill would be to take us further away from the policy which secures to settlers on the public lands the right of entry under the provisions of the homestead law, most certainly I should not be in favor of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be wiser policy, in the interest of the landless people of the country, now and for the future, to extend these laws to all the States and Territories, instead of repealing them as far as they go?

Mr. KASSON. That is the point.

Mr. GOODIN. I am certainly in favor of that; and if the gentleman will suggest any wiser method by which to reach the desired end, I would be glad to co-operate with him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would apply this rule to all the lands of the United States, offering them in small quantities for the benefit of the landless people.

Mr. GOODIN. Does the gentleman propose an amendment to the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think I could at once frame an amendment that would accomplish the purpose.

Mr. GOODIN. I feel confident there will be no opposition on the part of the Committee on the Public Lands to such an amendment. No, sir; since millions of acres of the public domain have been given away to enrich railway corporations, I think it high time that proper measures be adopted for the liberal disposal of what remains of them to actual settlers upon the sole condition of occupancy and cultivation, but I want the same rule of disposition of the public lands to apply equally in all parts of the Union; and in this spirit the pending bill was reported favorably by the committee. I would further add, that when any measure looking to the results indicated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] shall be proposed it shall have my hearty co-operation as well as that of the committee of which I am a member.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless it be objected to by the gentlemen composing the committee, I would move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to inquire as to the policy of extending the provisions of the homestead laws to all the lands of the United States—the exclusive appropriation of those lands under the provisions of the homestead laws.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] yield to allow the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN?]

Mr. MOREY. Not at present. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] and some other gentlemen who wish to speak on this subject; and I propose to keep control of the bill myself.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman allow to be read an amendment which I desire to offer?

Mr. MOREY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. It will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Hot Spring lands, in the State of Arkansas, shall be excepted from the operation of this act.

Mr. MOREY. I have no objection whatever to that amendment being incorporated in the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the provisions of this bill were not embraced in the general homestead act which the Committee on the Public Lands reported last year and which was passed by this House?

Mr. MOREY. Exactly and in terms.

Mr. CLYMER. So I understand; and therefore as special legislation is always objectionable when it can be avoided, and as we ought to be careful to maintain in all particulars the policy of our homestead laws, I ask the gentleman to allow this bill to be recommitted, that the committee may report the same general measure which received the favorable action of the House at the last session.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WALLS.]

Mr. WALLS. Mr. Speaker, I have much admiration for the sentiment so often expressed in this House that in our legislation here all the States ought to be placed upon a like footing, and I concur in the wish of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] that all the States should be treated alike in our laws affecting the public lands.

But the gentleman has further stated that the Representatives from the States of Mississippi, Florida, and Louisiana were present before the committee and that no one objected; that they all agreed this bill should be reported. I say, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill was read at the desk to-day it was the first time I had ever heard of it. Representing in part, as I do, nearly two million acres of Government land which have been especially set aside for the poor people of this country, and having no information in regard to this measure except what I have heard to-day on this floor, I cannot vote intelligently for the passage of the bill.

I heartily concur with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in the motion to recommit, so that we may understand it. I do not know that I will offer any opposition to the bill if I can properly understand it; but, as I have already said, representing in part two million acres of public land, which a large number of my constituents have taken the benefit of and which another large portion expect hereafter to take the benefit of, I cannot vote for a bill which has for its purpose, in my opinion, to place the States of Florida, Mississippi, and Louisiana upon the same footing with other States which have no public lands whatever.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, let us examine precisely what the pending bill involves. In 1866, at the close of the war, Congress passed a bill limiting the action of the homestead law in these four States of Louisiana, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi, the design being to give the colored people and the poor white people of these Southern States the exclusive right to take these public lands as homesteads, guarding them so that no foot of them could go into the hands of speculators. Under the homestead law the settler must pay a $16 fee and reside upon the land five years, while under the pre-emption law he only pays $1 fee for filing at the land office; and by holding for six or twelve months, making certain unimportant improvements, may thus be enabled to go on, cut timber from the land, and then at pleasure abandon or pre-empt it, (and may do the latter for the benefit of any speculator who furnishes him the money.) You will readily see the necessity of preserving the timber upon these lands, (which are chiefly valuable for the timber,) and that its preservation is very much jeopardized under this operation of the pre-emption law. Under that law the length of time to stay on the land is much shorter and the means of putting lands into the hands of speculators much greater. I think this limitation which secures all our lands for settlers' homesteads ought to extend to all the States; but while it does not, I do not think we can open first to pre-emption settlement and then under the proclamation of the President and the Department to which if we pass this bill these lands would be subject, also to sales at reduced rates. I do not think we can judiciously do anything of the kind, and I hope therefore the bill will be referred.

Mr MOREY. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a measure of very considerable importance. It ought not to be hastily passed or without due consideration, It proposes to reverse the policy adopted by Congress in 1866 after deliberate consideration. That policy grew out of a desire to secure homes for a large class of people in the South who had a right to ask recognition and favor from Congress. And now what are the reasons urged by the gentleman who reports this bill for its passage? In the first place he tells us we ought to consult the interest of the Government. By that he means, as I understood him, that the Government will, if this bill becomes a law, derive a profit from the sale of these lands under the pre-emption law. I conceive the interest of the Government would be much better promoted by securing settlement on the lands than by any pecuniary consideration it would receive from their sale. It is the interest of the Government that the lands should be settled upon and that our citizens should have homes. The Government is not a money-making partnership; it is a beneficial organization, designed to promote the general welfare. I conceive there is nothing, therefore, in that point made by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY.]

But he tells us homestead entries are made upon these lands without any intention of perfecting them, and that in the mean time the timber is sold, and thus the Government is injured. He seems to forget that precisely the same evil would result under the pre-emption law if this bill should be passed. A party makes his pre-emption entry long before he is required to make payment for the land, and he may in the mean time sell the timber; so that precisely the evil he points out will result if this bill should become a law. Therefore no good in that respect can be secured by the passage of this bill.

If these evils exist under the homestead law, or can exist under the pre-emption law, that is a reason why the Committee on the Public Lands should report a bill to prevent that evil hereafter, for it is not beyond legislation. But this bill does not meet the difficulty at all. It does not remove one evil to which the gentleman has referred.

I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that it is our policy not to restore the lands in the States named in the bill to the condition of other public lands. Our policy is to bring all of our public lands capable of settlement within the operation of the homestead law. If there be any exception which ought to be made in regard to lands valuable for timber only, let a provision be made for the sale of those lands, as was proposed in the last Congress in reference to timber lands upon the Pacific coast. But this bill proposes a means by which the millions of acres of public lands in the States named in it may be "gobbled up" under the pre-emption law and pass into the hands of speculators, so that those who may hereafter desire homesteads will be entirely deprived of the opportunity to acquire them.

Mr. GAUSE. How are lands in the other States prevented from being "gobbled up" by speculators?

Mr. LAWRENCE. They are being "gobbled up" by speculators, but in many States there are special provisions made which exempt lands from the operation of the pre-emption law. It is because they have been "gobbled up" in other States we see the necessity for some provision here.

Mr. GAUSE. There is a provision in this bill for homestead entry.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly; but under the operation of the pre-emption law the lands will all be soon taken up and homesteads can no longer be secured. There are in these States a large number of people, both colored and white, whose interest it is to secure homesteads. Many of them have not yet been able to do so; many of them have not learned how to do so; many of them have remained in ignorance of their rights. I speak in behalf of all these. I speak in behalf of homes for the people. I speak in behalf of that improved condition of the people and of society which the secure possession of homes will bring. Will any gentleman tell me why the policy of the act of 1866 should be reversed? Why should we cease to care for those who may need and desire to secure homesteads hereafter? I do not say it is the purpose, but the effect of the bill will be to deprive a deserving and large class of people from acquiring homesteads hereafter. Sound policy, justice, and humanity require us to encourage and aid permanent settlement upon these lands, as the homestead law will, securing a permanent population, a permanent society. This is vastly better than to give the lands over to speculators under the pre-emption laws, the effect of which will be that the timber may be taken off, and then neither the Government nor people at large will derive any benefit at all.

Mr. SAYLER. I would like to ask my colleague a question, with his consent.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will hear it.

Mr. SAYLER. I desire to ask him whether the pre-emption laws do not require settlement, and whether they do not also protect timber? I desire, also, that he will allow me to say in this connection that the Committee on the Public Lands has no disposition whatever to take a position against the fullest and most efficient homestead law, and that they are maturing such an act now. The only trouble about it is, that that act of 1866 seemed to be passed upon the principle of "forty acres and a mule." And the result has been that they have been cut down into such small quantities that the lands in Arkansas and other States are practically not settled at all. Now this same provision was ingrafted in the homestead bill, which passed the House during last session in the same form. I have no particular concern, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, whether it shall pass in a distinct form, or whether the bill shall be recommitted and it be ingrafted again in a general bill. But it is all wild for gentlemen to talk as they do here about the pre-emption laws. They are not so bad as represented.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My colleague seems to forget that if the existing law be objectionable because it does not allow a sufficient amount of land to be taken for homesteads, that may form a reason why the amount should be enlarged; but it is no reason why we should adopt a system which cuts off homesteads entirely.

Mr. SAYLER. Certainly not. The committee does not propose that, and the bill does not propose it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the bill will be recommitted with the instructions suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] with some slight amendment. It is well known that we have a large amount of timber lands in the country. Those timber lands are really of three distinct classes, the distinction growing, out in part, from the location of those lands. The pine-timber lands in Michigan, in Wisconsin, and Minnesota may be considered as constituting one class. Then the pine lands of the South may be considered as constituting another class; and the pine and timber lands of the Pacific coast constitute a third class.

I am informed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that he is at the present time preparing a bill to be presented to Congress, providing for a proper disposition of these different classes of the pine and other timber lands of the country. Now I have great confidence in the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY,] and I am very certain that he would not bring forward a bill here that should not be, in his judgment, fully right. But at the same time I trust and hope that this bill will be recommitted under the circumstances, and that we may have passed in this session, first, the bill which has been suggested by the gentleman from Indiana repealing the pre-emption laws of the country, and opening up all the tillable lands of the country to homestead entry, and homestead entry alone. Then along with that general and generous legislation there should be a timber act, specifying the different classes of timber land, and providing for the disposition of them.

We have very valuable timber lands, especially in my own State. Those lands ought not to be offered to pre-emption. They are too valuable, and are not fit for the purposes of cultivation. They therefore should be held under the provisions of a special law, to be disposed of for the benefit of the country, because they are timber lands, and because they are not agricultural lands. As I understand it a large proportion of the public lands in the South consists of this timber land. Now it is of no advantage to the people in the South that these lands be thrown open to homestead entry, because they are not tillable lands. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has told me within the last few days that he is at work preparing a bill that shall cover the disposition of the timber lands of the whole country, and there is already pending before the Committee on the Public Lands a bill, which I had the honor to introduce, relating to the timber lands of the West.

It is about time that the Congress of the United States protected the timber of the country—the pine timber, and the other kinds of timber. The time has come when there should be a stop put to speculating in the public timber lands of the country. I am very fully and thoroughly committed to the policy of homesteading all the public lands that are fit for cultivation. All that the Government wants of those lands is that they shall become the homes of producers. I hope that this bill will be recommitted, not for the purpose of the two contracted amendments suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, but for an amendment that shall include the timber lands of the country as well as the tillable lands.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it became my duty as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands during the last Congress to report a general bill to secure homesteads to settlers on the public domain; and in that bill we made this provision:

That an act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, approved May 20, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, and the act entitled "An act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida," approved June 21, 1866, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as repealing the act entitled "An act to amend an act relating to soldiers' and sailors' homesteads," approved June 8, 1872, nor the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 3, 1873, and any amendments to said acts.

We reported a bill that contained precisely the same principle as that contained in the bill which is advocated by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY.] It was passed by this House almost unanimously; it went over to the Senate, and that body not having time to reach it, it did not become a law. For considerations which were then sufficiently weighty with us, we recommended its passage to the House. We did not desire that any portion of the public lands should be singled out for exceptional legislation, and the repeal provided in that bill, as in this, placed all the lands of the country in exactly the same position with regard to homestead and pre-emption entry.

I therefore think that this bill ought to pass; but I do not ask that it should pass now. I do ask the member of the committee who has it in charge to allow it to be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, with a view to incorporating in a general bill what will apply to all the public lands in the country.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and then I shall ask the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] remarked, the timber lands in the North and South are fast decreasing in quantity. Those that are of any valuable use, and should be preserved to the country by some such law as it is desired now to repeal, are almost entirely and absolutely in the hands of a few capitalists in the country.

Now there are organizations of capitalists awaiting the time—and I speak partly from my own knowledge—when this bill which is proposed here to-day becomes a law who have already made their explorations of the pine lands of the South, those of the Northwest having been almost entirely taken up already; they have made their explorations and their estimates, and are ready whenever Congress shall open the door for their onward movement to take and absorb the large bodies of pine lands in all the Southern States.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman state that these lands will then come in to be sold at twelve and a half cents per acre under the existing law?

Mr. CONGER. I was coming to that. Under the laws as they now exist these lands could be purchased if this bill passes and becomes a law, and before the restraining law which the gentleman seems to desire could be passed, to extend this beneficent provision over all the States, I venture to say that, if there was an interval of but two weeks between the time of the taking effect of the two laws, there would be an entry of nearly the whole body of valuable pine lands in the South by gentlemen who have their maps made and who have prepared their lists and already formed their organization to purchase them.

Now, if it be the desire of this Congress to open a gate that would lead to the accumulation of large masses of the pine lands of the South, as they have been to some extent accumulated in the three northwestern pine-land States, the passage of this bill is desirable as it is. It repeals the only protection which the whole country has that the remaining pine lands of the United States shall not be given into the hands of speculators, and that these lands shall not be stripped for the immediate profit of those who purchase them, as I believe to the great detriment of the great body of the people and to the special detriment of the States in which those lands exist, and to the deprivation of the Government of timber for its fortifications and naval construction.

If I am correctly informed, Mr. Speaker, the pine lands of the South are not like the pine lands of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota—very valuable agricultural lands in many cases after the pine has been taken off, as is the case in these States. I know of my own knowledge that in each of these States some of the best lands in the State—the best white wheat-growing lands of Michigan—are among pine lands. There are lands in the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota that are called sand pine lands which are unfit for cultivation. These sand lands are confined to narrow strips on the borders of the lake or running through sections of the country. The white-pine lands of Michigan are mainly clothed with hard timber—beech, maple, and other timbers—and the land is of the best quality. It also produces in the State of Michigan white winter wheat. These lands are cultivated to-day, and are valuable for agricultural purposes after the pine is removed; whereas, if I am correctly informed, the pine lands of the Southern States are unfit for any purpose of cultivation; their only value consists in the pine upon them, and that pine is of as much value to the settler on the adjoining land as is the land itself, to enable him to build his houses, barns, and fences, and to construct his agricultural implements.

Now, to say nothing of the humanitarian view of this question, of preserving these lands for the freedmen who have not yet acquired even sufficient money perhaps to pay the small fee required for a homestead, or at least the means to go upon wild and uncultivated lands and support a family there, I think it is a great mistake to allow these lands, reserved for a humane as well as for an economical purpose, to be thrown open for two weeks, or even two months, to the grasp of the speculator. Let those gentlemen who in former Congresses have been the advocates of preserving the lands of the United States for the homeless and the landless examine the provisions of this bill, and they will see that, with the view that is taken of it, it must be injurious to the States in which those lands are situated and injurious to the homestead settlers who go upon those lands.

I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] that there should be special laws in regard to the timber lands of the United States that still remain in the possession of the Government, and I wish to say in this connection that I believe most if not all of the timber lands of the South to-day would come under the operation of the graduating laws, so that the Government would receive but twelve and a half or twenty-five cents, or at the most fifty cents, an acre for lands which ought most of them to bring to-day $25 or $30 an acre.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment longer.

Mr. MOREY. I cannot, for my hour is fast running out.

Mr. CONGER. I wish merely to call attention to the following, from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of this session:

> It is among the traditions of this Office—certified indeed by its records—that from a very early day eagerness to acquire title from the Government to these exceptionally valuable lands for speculative purposes has led to the perpetration of innumerable frauds. It is notorious that, as a rule, the soil itself of these lands possesses but limited fertility; and it is equally certain that such of them as are entered upon under the pre-emption and homestead laws are not generally so taken with a purpose of adding value to the tract by cultivation, but rather with the expectation of profiting by the after-sale of the timber growing upon it. Through the facilities furnished by that provision of the pre-emption laws which, for unoffered lands, extends to applicants a credit of thirty-three months, opportunity is found, under cover of the "declaratory statement," which gives to the pre-emptor protection, in his possession of the tract, to strip the lands of their timber and thereupon to abandon them without even the payment of the minimum price.

Mr. MCDILL. As a member of the committee reporting this bill to the House for consideration, I desire to say a word or two in reply to some remarks that have been made in opposition to this measure. There is no question that has so long and so favorably commended itself to my mind as the proposition that all the public lands fit for use for agricultural purposes shall be reserved for actual settlers. And while I am not authorized to speak for the Committee on Public Lands, yet I think I am violating no confidence and saying nothing that would be deemed improper when I say there is an evident disposition on the part of the Committee on Public Lands of this House to carry out that principle to probably its fullest extent.

The measure now before the House proposes simply to remove certain restrictions, to place, as far as possible, all the people of this country under one general law. Now, I think we ought all to be opposed to special laws, and so far as possible in all our legislation establish a general rule, which shall apply alike to every citizen and to every subject of this nation.

Suggestions have been made, and particularly by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. CONGER,] that commend themselves to me in a very favorable point of view. It may be possible that while the Committee on Public Lands are considering and preparing a measure that shall preserve the public lands for actual settlers, and that shall properly dispose of the public timber lands, yet in the short space of time that will elapse between the passage of this bill, if passed now, and the passage of those measures, the speculators to whom he refers may come in and take advantage of our delay in regard to those other measures. In view of that suggestion, I hope this bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and that we may be allowed to consider it further. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] except that I would suggest to him to insert the word "agricultural" before the word "land," so that his instructions would not bind us to provide that all lands shall be subject to homestead entry. Let us have an opportunity to provide some means by which the Government may derive some benefit from its timber land.

It is becoming an important question what generations after us are to do for timber. No one who has not examined the subject has any idea how our forests are disappearing before the ax of those engaged in the lumbering business. I was told last summer that but a few years ago the pine lands extended to the very borders of the city of Minneapolis, while now there are no pine lands within less than one hundred and fifty miles of that city. This has been accomplished in a very few years. And unless we protect our timber lands there will be no timber for the coming generation. Besides that, the Government is being defrauded of revenue to which it is entitled.

Under all the circumstances, I hope this bill will be recommitted. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] with the modification I have suggested.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It seems to me the House misapprehends entirely the object of this bill. The only object of it is to place the States named in it upon the same footing with the other States of the Union. It does not propose to interfere in the least with the homestead law, but simply to repeal an act that was passed some six or seven years ago, placing the States of Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida upon a different footing as to the public lands from the other States. Now if this bill shall pass, it will only place those States just where Minnesota and Ohio and the other States are placed, from which come the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill.

Now, sir, I know that I represent the sentiment of the people of Alabama of both political parties when I say that they are almost unanimously in favor of the passage of this bill. Upon this point I do not think there will be a dissenting voice from any Representative from Alabama. Republicans and democrats are alike in favor of it. A reference of the bill will, I fear, kill it; in may never be heard of again at this session. I hope, therefore, that the bill will be passed now.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands. In submitting this motion, I would like to occupy two or three minutes by an explanation in reply to some remarks that have been made on this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any scheme for the purpose of controlling bodies of the public lands in the interest of corporations has ever passed this House except upon the plea that it was for encouraging settlement and in the interest of the settler. Now, I undertake to say that the prevention of legislation in this direction will simply continue what has occurred for a number of years—the despoiling of the most valuable lands in the States named and under the operation of the homestead law. The pre-emption act is the only act now on the statute-book which punishes the despoiling of timber upon the public lands. The homestead law contains no provision for such punishment. But, sir, out of deference to the wishes of many gentlemen on this floor—friends of the bill as well as those opposed to it—who wish to examine its provisions, I have made this motion.

While upon the floor, I wish to repel the insinuation which has been made here that the Committee on the Public Lands is not prepared to go as far as legislation may be able to go in the interest of the settler. Any safeguard which may be suggested to them as proper to be thrown around the disposal of the public lands will be met by the committee in a spirit of cordial attention and approval. If this bill is not properly guarded, if there is the least possible danger that the land rings, of which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] seems to know so much, and who have gobbled up the valuable timber lands of Michigan and other Western States, may make a raid upon the southern timber lands, then I am most heartily in favor of recommitting the bill that it may be so guarded as to render such raids impossible.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow the bill to be recommitted, with instructions to the committee to inquire into the policy of the repeal of all laws authorizing the disposal of all the public lands adapted to agriculture, except the homestead laws for the benefit of actual settlers, and to report by bill or otherwise?

Mr. MOREY. My only objection to admitting that proposition is that I am unwilling this House or the country should suppose for a moment that the committee is not aware of the public sentiment on this subject. I can say that they are fully informed as to the sentiment of the country in regard to homesteads; and for that reason I do not think the proposed instruction necessary.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes not a peremptory instruction to the committee, but merely that they inquire into the expediency of doing certain things?

Mr. SAYLER. The Committee on Public Lands has that very subject under consideration; a subcommittee is giving it special attention. I do not think there is any need for instructions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the proposition, as gentlemen of the committee seem averse to it.

The motion of Mr. MOREY to recommit the bill was adopted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, my speech of the other day embraced a list of members of the present force in the House post-office; and that list (which was cut from the New York Times and handed to me as I stood here) embraced the name of Mr. Edmund Este as coming from Virginia and as having been in the confederate army. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] informs me that Mr. Este is a citizen of New York, not Virginia, and was never in the confederate army. I take great pleasure in making this correction upon the gentleman's information.

AMNESTY.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred House bill No. 214, with an accompanying amendment, have instructed me to report the bill and amendment back to the House in pursuance of the instructions of the House; and I now demand the previous question upon the bill and amendment.

Mr. McCRARY. Let me say a word before the gentleman demands the previous question. I do not desire to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will withhold his request until the bill as amended, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, has been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That all the disabilities imposed and remaining upon any person, by virtue of the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed; and each and every person is and shall be forever relieved therefrom upon their appearing before a judge of any court of the United States or any court of record of the State in which they are resident and taking and subscribing the following oath, to be duly attested and recorded, to wit: "I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same, and obey all laws made in pursuance thereof, and that I take this obligation freely and without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion whatever."

Mr. McCRARY. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me to say a word before the previous question is called.

Mr. KNOTT. It would afford me a great deal of pleasure to yield to my colleague on the committee and to a number of other gentlemen on that side as well as on my own side of the House, but I feel, sir, that neither the peace of the country nor the harmony of the House requires any further discussion of this proposition.

Mr. McCRARY. The chairman of the committee will allow me to say just this, that as a member of the committee which has reported the bill it seems to me I should be allowed to say to the House very briefly what we desire in reference to this matter. That is all we ask, except we desire to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. KNOTT. I will say to my colleague on the committee that I cannot conceive the members of the Judiciary Committee ought to have any more privileges in that direction than any other gentleman in the House, and for the purpose of stopping all further debate I insist on my demand for the previous question upon the bill and amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. COX. I object to any debate.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Kentucky will allow me without one word of debate to have a letter read?

Mr. COX. I object to debate. The gentleman shut us off yesterday.

Mr. KNOTT. I will not open the gate at all. I insist on my demand for the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask whether the republican minority of the Committee on the Judiciary concurred in this report?

Mr. COX. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the gentleman declines to yield to me.

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

Mr. RANDALL. You know better than to do this. [Laughter.]

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. FRYE demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 183, nays 92, not voting 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banks, Barnum, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. NOT VOTING—Messrs Adams, Banning, Bass, Chittenden, Farwell, Goode, Hays, Hoge, Hubbell, Kelley, Kimball, Lynde, Purman, Strait, and Andrew Williams—15.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HUNTON said: My colleague, [Mr. GOODE,] who was called home by extreme sickness in his family, has not yet appeared in his seat. If here he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, the question is on the passage of the bill reported from the committee.

Mr. SEELYE. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary allow me to call his attention to what is evidently a clerical error, but which ought to be rectified at this time? I notice that the bill reads in this way: "each and every person shall and is hereby declared to be free," &c., from "their" disabilities. The word "their" should of course be "his."

The SPEAKER. That correction will be made.

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 184, nays 97, not voting 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, Banks, Barnum, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Banning, Bass, Chittenden, Hays, Kimball, Lynde, Rainey, and Andrew Williams—9.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the bill was not passed.

During the roll-call the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. HOSKINS. My colleague, Mr. BASS, is detained at home by sickness. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. RUSK. My colleagues, Mr. LYNDE and Mr. KIMBALL, are both unavoidably absent. If here Mr. LYNDE would vote "ay" and Mr. KIMBALL "no."

Mr. WHITE. I am in favor of amnesty, but I desire it to come from this side of the House. I vote "no."

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I am in favor of the passage of a bill including Mr. Davis, but I shall vote "no" in order to allow the gentleman from Maine to present his amendment, on which I should vote "no."

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to say that I am in favor of this bill in its present shape. I only vote in the negative to allow the gentleman from Maine to offer his amendment, which when offered I will vote against. I vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not yield the floor. The motion I have made is debatable.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maine retain the floor?

Mr. BLAINE. To move to reconsider the vote just taken. I do not desire to occupy much time; do not be alarmed.

Mr. RANDALL. O, we are not alarmed.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a parliamentary question. Has the gentleman from Maine the right to take the floor on a privileged question and then to hold the floor and debate that question? I know when that gentleman presided during the last Congress he made qualified recognitions of gentlemen on the floor. If that is the rule of the House, I insist that it be observed.

Mr. BLAINE. I am strictly within the rules of the House, as the Chair well knows.

The SPEAKER. If the subject-matter upon which the motion to reconsider is based is debatable, then the motion is debatable; and therefore the gentleman from Maine is in order in demanding the right to debate.

Mr. MILLS. Can he claim the floor to exercise that right?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly. I have got the floor for an hour, and you cannot prevent it.

Mr. MILLS. I did not ask the gentleman from Maine a question, but the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, the object of this side of the House is not to become obstructive, is not to delay legislation by those means with which in the last Congress we were made so familiar. We have no desire to filibuster, although the civil-rights bill, which was designed to give the rights of manhood to the colored members, was ordered to be reported regularly from a committee, and for seventeen consecutive Monday mornings filibustering cut off the chance to report it; and one of the chief parliamentary glories of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was that by extreme use of this power he prevented the consideration of that bill. We design no such process. We simply desire to have a vote upon the question whether Jefferson Davis shall be included in this general amnesty; and in addition to that, if my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] who smiles with that winsome smile to which I am always ready to respond, will allow me, he will observe that my amendment is better than his in another respect. I will read it in the original terms in which I offered it:

That all persons now under disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, with the exception of Jefferson Davis, late president of the so-called Confederate States, shall be relieved of such disabilities upon their appearing before any judge of the United States and taking and subscribing, in open court, the following oath, duly attested:

Now the gentleman's amendment makes it necessary that an oath be taken in any court in any State, a court of probate for instance—any small court. I think that this is a matter with which the United States is dealing. It is a governmental matter between the Government of the United States and some of its erring children. They are coming back to the United States to be reclothed and rehabilitated with the full rights and glories of American citizenship. I think that important transaction should be cognizable only in the courts of the United States. In that respect I claim that my amendment is better than that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. As to the oath proposed in the two amendments, there is no difference between them, or if there is any difference it is merely verbal.

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that there is a difference in this, that the last part of the oath required by the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts includes all laws made under the Constitution. Yours does not.

Mr. BLAINE. Then his is better than mine.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Maine will allow me to say that it is the only instance in history where a man has ever been required to take an oath to support all the laws.

Mr. BLAINE. Then he is harder on them than I am.

Mr. KASSON. Of course he is.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, I do not propose to be harder; I want to be generous and liberal. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says that, if his colleague's amendment passes, a man who failed to put a two-cent stamp on a check after he has sworn to obey the laws will have violated his oath.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman will understand that we intend to obey all the laws.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; but at the same time there should be no pitfalls for the unwary in our legislation.

Mr. BANKS. There are no unwary men on our side.

Mr. BLAINE. Which is the gentleman's side? [Great laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. It is the side of the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAINE. If there is any better place to have that subject adjudicated than in the courts of the United States I have never found it.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, if the laws of the United States could be considered or administered in any other courts than those of the United States there might be some justification for it. The amendment that I offered places these men upon precisely the same basis as that upon which aliens stand when they apply for admission to citizenship under the Government. I did not see that there was any necessity of making a distinction between men in this country who are laboring under political disabilities and aliens or strangers or foreigners who come here and ask to be admitted to citizenship.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter which I endeavored to have this morning the poor privilege of reading, and which I could not get, but again under the rules of the House, always beneficent, and which I have no doubt will always be beneficent as administered by the honorable occupant of the chair, I have that privilege. This morning I received a letter which I commend to gentlemen from the South. With that fascinating eloquence which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] possesses, he called your attention to the great value in this centennial year of having no man in the length and breadth of the land under the slightest political disabilities, and why except poor Jefferson Davis! I have here a letter written to me without any request and, so far as I know, without any expectation that it would be made public; but I am sure that even if it be a private letter the gentleman writing it will pardon me for reading it. It is as follows:

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA, January 12, 1876.

MY DEAR SIR: I observe there is excitement in the House on the amnesty proposition.

In 1870 I was impeached and removed from office as governor of this State solely because of a movement which I put on foot according to the Constitution and the law to suppress the bloody Ku-Klux. This was done by the democrats of this State, the allies and the echoes of northern democrats. I was also disqualified by the judgment of removal from holding office in this State. The democratic legislature of this State and its late constitutional convention were appealed to in vain by my friends to remove this disability. The late convention, in which the democrats had one majority by fraud, refused by a strict party vote to remove my disabilities thus imposed; and I am now the only man in North Carolina who cannot hold office.

I think these facts should be borne in mind when the democrats in Congress clamor for relief to the late insurgent leaders. Pardon the liberty I have taken in referring to this matter, and believe me, truly, your friend,

W. W. HOLDEN.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE.

Now, gentlemen, what have you to say to that? It is purely a political impeachment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. He is not the first criminal in the land debarred from office.

Mr. BLAINE. O! it is purely a political impeachment; not prosecution, but persecution; persecution of a man for opinion's sake. And it is to-day within the design of the democratic party to remove Governor Ames, of Mississippi, from his chair by impeachment, and to disqualify him from holding office. The legislation proposed here has this end, that two friends of the Union, one a Union man of North Carolina and the other as gallant a Union soldier as ever tied sash around his body, are to be disfranchised and disabled men, and poor Jefferson Davis is to be let free to enjoy the centennial at Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir.

Mr. SOUTHARD. We would like to know where Governor Holden was during the late war?

Mr. BLAINE. There is no use in asking any questions about this thing. These facts do not require any questions; there is no doubt about them.

Now, I desire to offer my bill, and I will yield to any gentleman on the other side of the House to move to strike out the exclusion of Jefferson Davis, and they can, such is the temper of this House, probably have the bill passed within thirty minutes.

Mr. ASHE. I desire to make a remark.

Mr. BLAINE. No; I do not think there is any need of it that I can see. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ASHE] will get up and say he is for universal amnesty, including Governor Holden, I will give him the floor to do so.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I, speaking for North Carolina, will say that I am for it.

Mr. BLAINE. O, yes; but why did not your constitutional convention do that when it had the power in North Carolina.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard.

Mr. DAVIS, Mr. WADDELL, Mr. SCALES, and Mr. YEATES rose.

Mr. BLAINE. O, gentlemen, come here yourselves with clean hands, and not come here as persecutors of men who never rebelled against the Government of the United States.

A MEMBER. Holden did.

Mr. BLAINE. But General Ames never did. You come here intending to disable men who fought gallantly for the Union. You come here with the intent to drive from the executive chair of Mississippi Adelbert Ames and to disqualify him in this centennial year from holding office. You come here refusing to remove the disabilities of William W. Holden. Now I will say that if gentlemen on the other side are willing to let this bill come to a vote I will yield without any further words.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order that the gentleman has no right to offer his amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the gentleman objects.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to any proceeding not in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the gentleman to object to my bill being offered?

Mr. RANDALL. When I have the right to speak in reply to you you will hear what I have to say.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well. I ask unanimous consent to offer this bill, and then I will yield the floor at the same time to any gentleman who desires to move to strike out the exclusion.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. You object!

Mr. BANKS. It is not in order.

Mr. BLAINE. It is in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. BANKS. The bill is not before the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent to offer this bill.

Mr. BANKS. It is not in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAINE. O, nonsense. What is to prevent it?

Mr. BANKS. The rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The pending business before the House is the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman knows very well that after I have objected he is out of order.

Mr. BLAINE. Out of order for what?

Mr. RANDALL. You have no right to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I have a right to talk about it.

I again wish to make this proposition that I may bring the bill before the House by unanimous consent, and I will yield to any gentleman to move an amendment to it. I will give to that side of the House all I have asked for this side. Now, if it be the case that gentlemen will refuse that proposition, then it is because they do not want any bill passed. I am for a practicable amnesty. I am for an amnesty that will go through.

Mr. RANDALL. O, you are not sincere in the least degree.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I again desire to submit that question. I ask unanimous consent to offer this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to understand the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. If we will vote to remove the disabilities of Governor Ames and Governor Holden, will he vote to remove the disabilities of Jefferson Davis? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen on the other side decline my proposition and want no further debate, I will give the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] an opportunity to bring up the centennial bill, which has been postponed an entire week by this amnesty bill occupying the attention of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The time consumed and the consequent postponement of the centennial bill are wholly chargeable to your side of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will end this matter, which I have within my power. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will renew that motion a moment in order to give me an opportunity to say a word.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; the gentleman refused me the poor privilege of offering my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to say that I have no desire to make Jefferson Davis a hero or a martyr.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. ASHE. Mr. Speaker——[Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. MAISH. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Maine having made a motion to reconsider, and it having been considered by the House, can he withdraw it?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The motion has not been considered by the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order, that this is private-bill day.

The SPEAKER. But being private-bill day, this motion is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on the pension appropriation bill be limited to thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the pension appropriation bill was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 811) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ATKINS. Having had the honor to report this bill, there are some statistics to which I will briefly allude bearing upon the subject-matter. It will be observed that the appropriation for Army pensions is $29,000,000, being less by $500,000 than the estimate for the preceding fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

This does not result from any decrease in the rate of pensions, for rather it has been increased by recent legislation; but it is to be attributed to a decrease in the whole number of pensioners on the roll. In 1871 the average rate of pensions paid to Army invalids was $89.18 per annum; in 1872 it was $90.26; in 1873 it was $96.46; in 1874, $98.14; and in 1875 the average rate reached to $103.91, or $8.65 per month, being a gradual annual increase. Of Army invalids on the roll on the 30th of June, 1875, there were 105,408, or 3,021 more than there were at the end of the fiscal year 1874. But the losses upon the balance of the pension-roll of all classes were 4,526 for the same year, or a net loss upon the whole roll of 1,420.

The increasing rate and the increased number of Army invalids swelled the general aggregate sum for that class of pensioners by $344,733.14 for the last fiscal year over that of the preceding year of 1874. A brief résumé of the amounts paid for pensions of all kinds and the number upon the whole roll since the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, may be of interest, as it will reasonably indicate or approximate the future charge upon the Treasury of this branch of the public service.

On the 30th of June, 1873, the whole number of pensioners of all classes was 238,411; the amount expended was $29,185,289.62. For 1874 the whole number was 236,241; the amount expended was $30,593,749.56. For 1875 the whole number was 234,821; the amount expended was $29,683,116.63. For 1876 the entire number is not yet known, and the whole amount to be expended can be only estimated. The amount appropriated is $29,500,000.

The estimate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, upon which this bill is based, is $29,000,000, being $683,116.63 less than the actual expenditures of the past fiscal year, and $500,000 less than the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year, as will appear by reference to the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions, page 7.

Upon the whole roll of Army pensions there is a gradual decrease both in number and the annual sums paid to the pensioners. While the Army invalids are gradually increasing, their widows, minors, dependant relatives, and the survivors and widows of the war of 1812 are decreasing in a greater ratio, thus diminishing the annual amount of appropriation for the whole number. And yet it must be admitted that this ratio of reduction is modified or counterbalanced in some degree by the annual increase of pension rates. Altogether, it is gratifying to know that the annual charge upon the Treasury for Army pensions has reached its highest figures.

A comparison of the annual aggregate of Navy pensions for the few past years shows a different result. Instead of decreasing, it is slowly increasing. For the year ending June 30, 1874, the amount expended was $474,000; for the year ending June 30, 1875, the amount expended was $520,348.47; for this fiscal year $500,000 was appropriated, and the Commissioner informs us that it will prove insufficient. The estimate for next year is $533,500. The reason of this increased amount for Navy pensions is attributable to the "steady gain of the invalid-roll, both in numbers and average rates," and to the "increase of the aggregate annual amount of the widows' roll." And yet upon the whole aggregate roll of Army and Navy pensions—that is, the roll embracing every class of pensions—the number of pensioners and the amount annually paid them are both diminishing, and will doubtless continue to do so in the future.

Of course it is the duty of every government to pension the disabled soldiers and seamen and their officers who have lost their limbs or health in the service of their country. To this end general laws have been enacted and certain rates prescribed. Guided by these laws and rates, the committee have scrutinized the estimates of the Commissioner with reasonable care, and although the sum seems large, nevertheless with the number of names now standing upon the rolls and the rates fixed by law they cannot see how the amount can be properly reduced. No doubt there are many persons—hundreds, perhaps thousands—who are annually drawing this succor from the public treasury who really are not justly entitled to this bounty, but who through fraud and chicanery have managed to deceive the judgment and elude the vigilance of the officers of the Government. The number of frauds, however, is growing less every year, I believe.

With certain amendments to the pension laws, it is believed that these fraudulent combinations or rings to plunder the Treasury under the sacred guise of a soldier's honor and in the exalted name of patriotism can be in the main broken up and prevented. But, sir, all will admit that it is better that impositions now and then should be submitted to and become an unjust burden upon the Treasury than that one single soldier or sailor who is entitled to this stipend under the laws of the land and through an enlightened and humane public policy should be denied his right to the same by a failure in Congress to make the necessary appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman desires to speak on this bill, they can now have the opportunity to do so. If no one desires to do so, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read for amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] having charge of this bill a question, or rather to call his attention to certain provisions in the bill for explanation. I see on the second page of the bill these words: "Compensation to pension agents and the expenses of the several pension agencies, $200,000, as provided under the act of June 6, 1874, and of March 3, 1873;" and further on in the bill, beginning with line 30, these words: "Compensation to pension agents, $2,500, including such contingent expenses as may be authorized by the Commissioner of Pensions." I presume one has reference to Army pension agents and the other to Navy pension agents.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. But I desire to ask further whether the gentleman has any information of the amount of contingent expenses which have been paid out in the Pension Bureau under the law of Congress which authorizes the Commissioner of Pensions to detail clerks to make investigations?

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot say that my attention has been called to that particular point. These contingent expenses are for safes and stationery in addition to what is expressed upon the face of the bill. I move, if there be no amendment proposed, that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask the gentleman to withhold that motion for the present. I would like to have this bill recommitted, and for a purpose which I will indicate in a moment. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have had occasion to examine somewhat into this pension business, and formed the opinion that an item which is in this appropriation bill just reported has been made, and unnecessarily made, for the purpose of furnishing offices for greedy officials to fill. I am as respectful as I can be in speaking of greedy officials; but in the State of Illinois there has been a great desire, not only for the offices, but to extend the number so as to get enough for all to fill. I refer to these pension agencies.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must speak to some motion.

Mr. SPARKS. Very well; I move to strike out the appropriation of $200,000 for compensation to pension agents and the expenses of the several pension agencies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make a speech. I have never conceived, in my experience of wagoning, that it was necessary for a wagon to have five wheels; and it has struck me likewise to be just about as important that one should have five wheels as that we should have what is known as a pension agency. The result is, as I will state: in the State of Illinois, where we have nineteen pension agents, generally officious ward politicians where they are in cities, and working, active political tricksters in the rural districts. Now what is the result of these agencies? At a certain period a draft is sent to one of these pension agents for the payment of pensioners within his district. He has a friend who is a banker. It is so in my district, and I confine it to my district. He deposits this money in his friend's bank, of which, perhaps, he is one of the owners of stock, and communicates by letter throughout the rural districts through the rural post-offices.

Mr. FORT. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPARKS. Not in my five minutes; you can make your speech afterward.

Mr. FORT. Very well.

Mr. SPARKS. I prefer not to be interrupted. I am not afraid of the gentleman, but do not want to be interrupted.

After he gets his draft, we will say, for instance, that it is for $50,000, he will put it in a bank discounting paper daily. He then addresses a note to the various post-offices throughout his district, when he has leisure to do it, perhaps a month afterward. This goes by slow mail. The pensioner receives a letter to this effect: "Please sign the within receipt and return to me, and I will address you a communication inclosing a draft for the amount due you for the quarter." That is the sense of it. It takes about six weeks to get it into the hands of the pensioner. Of course he signs the receipt and returns it to the pension agent, who at leisure sends him a check upon this bank. The pensioner gets that check in due course of mail, (and it does not run fast in the country,) and he goes to some banker in his locality to get his money upon it. These bankers, as I am informed, invariably charge from a quarter to fifty cents——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to oppose the amendment. I concur in all that the gentleman from Illinois says, and I would seek to give a remedy. But the gentleman will observe that this bill is made up in obedience to law. What he complains of is a maladministration of existing law; and I might just as well say here that the enormous number of frauds that have been practiced do not spring out of the amount appropriated at all, but spring from an indifferent administration of the law. The Committee on Appropriations felt that they were unable to remedy that, but they desire to call the attention of the appropriate committee, namely, the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the matter, that they may at this session introduce some general law which will prevent this enormous fraud that has been practiced upon the pension fund.

I am not able to say what amount is annually lost to the Government by this description of fraud, but I am led to believe that it is not short of a million dollars. But gentlemen will see at once that the Committee on Appropriations did not dare to cut down this amount, for the reason that if they did so they would punish the innocent along with the guilty, and you know the old maxim of the law in that respect. Now if the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman will understand that the amendment I offered touches simply the amount that goes to the pension agent, not what goes to the pensioner. I want the pensioner to have every cent.

Mr. RANDALL. I am running somewhat in the direction of what is the gentleman's wish. But this is not the place nor is this the manner of reaching the remedy. If you cut off all pay to these pension agents, you will not have the pensions distributed to the pensioners. I agree with the gentleman that there ought to be a remedy and a better plan introduced for the distribution of pensions. I believe, for instance, that if the Pension Bureau for the distribution of pensions was handed over to the War Department, where it formerly was, we should have more integrity of administration than we now have. I believe, further, that if the payment was handed over to the postmasters of the country the result would be great economy, and that the thirty thousand and odd postmasters in the various cities and towns throughout the Union could be made a detective force as against these frauds. I do not want while the present law exists, and while it is the only means for the distribution of the pension fund to those who have honestly earned their right to it, to have these agencies stricken out. But if the gentleman introduces a bill which will prevent these frauds, these enormous frauds that are now being practiced, he will find me urgent in pressing it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his amendment?

Mr. SPARKS. I withdraw it.

Mr. FORT. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I certainly concur in the effort to reduce the expenses of paying the pensions to the pensioners. During last Congress we did, as we thought, all we could in that direction; but if there can be anything else done it certainly shall have my humble support upon this floor. I am now upon my feet, however, to be set right in this debate. I understood the gentleman who has just taken his seat to concur in all that the gentleman who preceded him had said. I understood the gentleman who preceded him to say that in Illinois there were nineteen pension agents. If that be so, Mr. Chairman, I think it high time that something should be done to rid Illinois of about fifteen or sixteen greedy office-holders.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say there were nineteen.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to correct your statement.

Mr. FORT. You said you concurred in all that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] stated.

Mr. RANDALL. I meant in his general principles, of course.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman in his magnanimity would not be interrupted by me, and I do not desire now to be interrupted myself. I have only this to say, that if a remedy can be reached which will rid Illinois and relieve the tax-payers of this country of these nineteen office-holders I am in favor of it. Certainly no more than two or three are necessary to pay the pensions in that State. The less there are the better, and I will co-operate with any gentleman on that side who will bring forward a measure by which we can reduce the number, or a measure by which we can pay the pensions without the interposition of a pension agent at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are there nineteen pension agents in Illinois?

Mr. FORT. I understood the gentleman to say there are nineteen. I do not know myself of more than two or three in the State.

Mr. MORRISON. My colleague [Mr. FORT] knows very well that there is not anything like nineteen. What is the use of saying it?

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. JENKS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 12 strike out the words "authorized by the Commissioner of Pensions" and insert the words "provided by law;" so that it will read: "For survivors of the widows of the war of 1812, $1,500,000, including such contingent expenses as may be provided by law."

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in order that I may lay before the House what to me seems to be of some importance. I inquired of the gentleman who reported this bill what those contingent expenses were. He replied that one of those contingent expenses was the providing of safes for certain agents who lived in towns of not sufficient importance to have a bank. Now, as a matter of fact, we know that all the pension moneys are kept in banks; and, if there are pension agents in towns so small that they have not any banks, those agencies should be stopped at once.

I have sent to the Commissioner of Pensions for information, inquiring how many pensioners there are, at each rate, in order that in future I may lay before the House what per cent. of the money expended by the Government goes into the hands of pensioners and what into the hands of officers. If we are furnished with the exact number of pensioners and the amount each one receives, then we shall be enabled to know what per cent. of the amount we appropriate is consumed by friction in the hands of the officers and how much actually passes into the hands of the pensioner. Hence I make the motion that this contingent fund should not be appropriated until we know these facts.

Mr. ATKINS. A very small portion of the amount appropriated in the clause which the gentleman proposes to strike out would be for the contingent fund. How much does the gentleman suppose of this amount goes to the contingent fund?

Mr. JENKS. I have nothing to suppose; I observe that the aggregate amounts to $500,000.

Mr. ATKINS. The amount that goes to the contingent fund is only $10,000.

Mr. JENKS. Well, that is worth taking out.

Mr. ATKINS. To be sure it is; but the Commissioner of Pensions thinks it necessary to have this contingent fund for stationery and for the purpose of obtaining safes.

Mr. JENKS. I would like to know how much of it is lost by friction in the hands of officers and how much of it goes into the hands of pensioners.

Mr. ATKINS. This bill was drawn in accordance with existing laws and in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions. It is very much in form with the bills which have preceded it for many years; and after an investigation, as far as I could go into the very voluminous papers of the Pension Office—and they are indeed very voluminous—my judgment was that there was no friction, to use the gentlemen's term, that I could see, at least in this bill. I inquired into these contingent funds and asked what they were for, and was told that they were for safes, stationery, and matters of that kind.

Now, sir, I do not think that the objection that the gentleman is making particularly applies to this bill, but it may apply to existing laws upon the statute-book. And let me submit most respectfully to the gentleman that this is not the time to change existing laws. We are upon an appropriation bill, and I aver that this appropriation bill is in accordance with existing laws.

Now, if the honorable gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions desires to reform the laws on the subject of pensions let him bring forward a bill, and for one, being one of the humblest members of the House, I will co-operate with him by giving it my vote, provided there is real reform in it. I have no doubt, sir, that there are abuses, and very many abuses, in the administration of the pension laws. I have no doubt that there are many frauds perpetrated. But this is not the place to detect them, nor is it the place to prevent them, because in attempting to prevent them in this way you may prevent the soldiers and seamen of the country who have lost limbs or health in the service of the country from receiving this stipend which the laws and the public policy of the country provide they shall have.

Mr. JENKS. I withdraw the amendment which I offered, and I now move to strike out, in line 14, the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-nine;" so that the clause will read:

Fees for preparing vouchers and administering oaths, $249,000.

Mr. Chairman, the very question which we are now considering is whether this be in accordance with existing laws. How do we know that all of this large fund is expended in accordance with existing laws which it is necessary to carry out? I am certainly far from desiring that any soldier or seaman should be deprived of one cent of the amount due him. I am in favor of extending to them this, which is not a gratuity, but a debt which the Government owes to those who have served their country. But that this large fund should be appropriated without knowing to what purpose it is to be applied is not in accordance with the wisdom that this House should display.

Now, the inquiries I have made at the Pension Office will bring forward information which will enable the House to judge upon this question. I have made inquiries as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, asking the Commissioner to state how many pensioners there are at each rate and how many persons entitled to artificial limbs or entitled to commutation therefor. When he gives us that information it will then be a matter of mathematical calculation how many dollars and cents go into the hands of the pensioners and how much is worn off as it passes through the hands of officers. If we find that a large amount is worn off we have a right to say that the appropriation is larger than is provided for by the provisions of existing laws, and therefore I think that this bill ought not to pass until we have this information. If we find that the great mass of the appropriation is correctly appropriated, even though some be misappropriated, well and good; but if the friction is large, then the amount is certainly too large. I say therefore that the bill ought not to be pressed to its final passage until we have received this information.

Mr. HURLBUT. I understand this bill has been carefully prepared by the Committee on Appropriations to carry out well-known provisions of existing laws. The appropriations are reasonably limited and the bill is complete in itself. The objections which are taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] are wholly within the control of the committee of which he is chairman, and not within the control of the Committee on Appropriations, nor this Committee of the Whole, because all points of order have been reserved on this bill, which cuts off all new legislation; and whatever objections the gentleman may find to the existing system, either in the pension-laws or their administration, must be remedied by some separate independent measure looking to that end. He has no right, under the rules of the House, to embarrass this bill with any vague surmises.

We have been told by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL,] in whom I have the greatest confidence, that this bill, in the judgment of that committee, (and its members are all careful men,) appropriates simply the exact amount necessary for the purpose of carrying out existing laws. It would be graceful for us, after that statement, to pass this bill as rapidly as we can, and leave to be passed hereafter whatever measures the keen vision of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] may discover to be necessary.

Mr. JENKS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend line 19 of this bill by inserting after "1873" the words, "but no pension agent shall receive more than $3,000 per annum for his services."

Mr. HURLBUT. I raise the point of order that that is new legislation; the compensation of pension agents is provided by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken; the amendment is not in order.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. For the purpose of making an inquiry, I move to strike out the words "fees for procuring vouchers and administering oaths, $250,000." So far as my observation goes, the various pension agents in actual practice send blanks to the pensioners, who are required to go before a clerk of a court of record, or before some notary public whose seal has been or shall be authenticated by the seal of a court of record, and make out the requisite affidavit required by law. And I further understand that in point of practice these pensioners are required to pay the fees that are charged for this class of services under existing State laws. Now I do not understand what particular vouchers and what particular oaths are required that would necessitate the expenditure of $250,000; and the motion I make, to strike out this clause, is for the purpose of enabling the honorable gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. ATKINS] to explain to the House, so that we may vote understandingly on this proposition.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It is now after four o'clock, and it is evident I think that we cannot get through with this bill to-day. I therefore move that the committee now rise.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the committee will not rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York will withdraw that motion.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If gentlemen will stop this long debate, I will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. BAKER.] This bill from the Committee on Appropriations is drawn in the exact words of the estimates furnished to the House by the Commissioner of Pensions. The Committee on Appropriations have adopted the exact language of the exact estimates furnished by the Commissioner. We all can see that there may be important reforms that ought to be made in our system of paying pensions, not only to secure economy on the part of the Government, but for the purpose of increasing to the pensioners themselves their facilities for receiving their quarterly pensions from the Government. But I trust there will be no effort made to embarrass this bill. Let us in regard to this bill pursue the policy heretofore pursued, and let the Committee on Pensions report to us a general bill correcting the various abuses which are now believed to exist, and we can consider the bill by itself.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to ask a question, as I believe the gentleman will be able to answer it. I wish him to explain the purpose of appropriating $250,000 for preparing vouchers and administering oaths. Now will he tell us what particular class of vouchers and oaths come under that provision?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must perceive that this item of $250.000 has not special reference to the preparing of vouchers. The whole paragraph must be considered together. It is for the preparation of vouchers, the administering of oaths, and the expenses of the Pension Bureau in connection with all the matters to which it refers.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. What oaths?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oaths that are administered to the pensioners themselves.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. By whom?

Mr. HOLMAN. By whoever administers oaths, those that are administered especially by the pension agents. I agree with my colleague that important reforms ought to be made; and I will say to him further that this is the only bill that will come before this House this session that will not be the subject of thorough and critical examination with a view to retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government. For one I am not willing to risk any legislation that may by possibility affect the interests of that great body of men who have such strong claims upon us in connection with the justice of the Government.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to disclaim any intention or purpose to place any obstacle in the way of the prompt and full payment of this most deserving class of our citizens at the earliest practicable moment, but I do want to know what the $250,000 is to be expended for before I vote for it.

Mr. ATKINS. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the committee accordingly rose, and (the Speaker having resumed the chair) Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 811) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ATKINS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING CONTESTED-ELECTION PAPERS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, moved the printing of papers in the contested-election cases from the first congressional district of Alabama, Bromberg vs. Haralson; the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts, Abbott vs. Frost; and the South Carolina contested election of Buttz vs. Mackey.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDGMENTS OF ALABAMA CLAIMS COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. LORD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 382) providing for the payment of the judgments of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims as soon after the 22d day of January, 1876, as may be.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be taken as an original bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered and to be rendered pursuant to section 11 of chapter 459, of the laws of the Forty-third Congress.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, as soon after the 22d day of January, A. D. 1876, as may be practicable, report to the Secretary of State the several judgments which before or on that day shall be rendered by the said court pursuant to section 11 of chapter 459 of the Laws of the Forty-third Congress.

SEC. 2. That the said court, after the 22d day of July, 1876, in like manner report to the Secretary of State the several judgments it shall render pursuant to said section 11, from the said 22d day of January to and including said 22d day of July.

SEC. 3. That when a report is made under this act to the Secretary of State he transmit the same, or a copy thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall without unnecessary delay proceed pursuant to said chapter 459 to pay the judgments specified therein, with interest on the principal at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, from the date of loss as certified, until the Secretary of the Treasury shall give notice for payment as provided by section 14 of such act.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. LORD. I now ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred certain bills relating to the payment of the judgments of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, respectfully reports—

That the aggregate of claims presented to the court of commissioners of the Alabama claims, under section 11 of chapter 459 of the Laws of the Forty-third Congress, is	$12,673,451 44
Of this aggregate the court had disposed of, before January 1, 1876.	9,704,608 65
Leaving unadjudicated	2,968,842 79
The court has rendered judgments amounting—
Of principal to	4,393,522 11
Of interest	2,051,070 72
Aggregate of judgments and interest	6,444,592 83

Assuming that the claims upon which the judgments are yet to be rendered will be reduced in the ratio of less than one-half of claims already passed upon, the whole amount, including interest to be paid under section 11, and allowing $1,300,000 for claims not proved, (should the Congress allow any further proof under said section 11,) will not exceed $10,000,000.

The present value of the Alabama fund in currency is about $20,000,000.

No question is made in any quarter but that the debts provable under section 11 of said act have precedence over any other claims; and if it should hereafter be held that the United States is not controlled in the disposition of the sum awarded by the tribunal of arbitration by the views expressed by such tribunal, then it would of course follow that the disposition made by said act, and by the act herewith reported, of a portion (or, if it should prove to be, the whole of the sum so awarded) would be within the power of the Congress.

The priority of the claims provable under said section 11 being thus conceded and established and the duration of the court having been from time to time extended, it would seem to be unjust to require the claimants in whose favor judgments are rendered to wait until "the conclusion of the business of the said court," as provided in the original act.

Your committee therefore recommends that the bill herewith submitted be en acted as a substitute for House bill No. 382, introduced by Mr. FRYE.

Mr. HOAR. Let me ask the gentleman from New York a question. This bill provides for the payment at the rate of 4 per cent. interest from the date of the loss. Of course that 4 per cent. should not be allowed if it has already been included in the judgment. I ask the gentleman simply to state to the House what has already been stated to me by a member of the committee: first, whether the judgment is so framed as to include interest, and, next, whether the judgment in each case fixes the date of loss?

Mr. LORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Is this bill reported for immediate consideration and passage?

Mr. LORD. It is. I will answer the gentleman from Massachusetts that the original act provides the judgment shall not include the interest, but the interest is reported in this bill. The aggregate of $6,444,000 includes the amount of interest awarded, which was not provided in the original law. The bill provides that the interest shall be paid from the date of loss certified by the court.

Mr. HOAR. I so understood, but I desired that it should go on the record.

Mr. GARFIELD. As I understood from the reading of the bill, all the settled claims up to the present time are to be paid off in full. Suppose the fund should give out and the last settlements should get nothing? It occurs to me there should be some arrangement by which the payments should be made pro rata unless we can be perfectly sure that there will be enough to pay all.

Mr. LORD. I will answer the gentleman by stating that, after the settlement of all the claims that could be proved, there will be a surplus of $10,000,000. That fact I have ascertained from the reports of the court: that in any case there will be that surplus.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is, after paying the claims authorized to come in under existing law?

Mr. LORD. Yes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LORD. The Committee on the Judiciary instruct me to report another bill, to the passage of which I think there will be no objection when it is read.

The bill (H. R. No. 1054) to extend the time for claimants, under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, to prove their claims was received, and read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill has not been printed.

Mr. LORD. This is a substitute for a bill which has been printed, the bill H. R. No. 681, and simply provides that claimants who are on the ocean and have claims in the aggregate certainly under half a million dollars shall not be debarred from presenting their claims on account of their absence.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as the bill has not been printed, I hope the gentleman will consent to its being recommitted.

Mr. LORD. I consent.

The bill was accordingly recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a motion of greater privilege. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask that by unanimous consent the House shall meet to-morrow as in committee for debate only. I ask this that several gentlemen who are prepared to do so may be allowed to make speeches. I do not ask it for myself, as I will not be here.

Mr. PAGE. I object.

ROOMS FOR COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House do now adjourn, but the Chair asks the House to tarry a moment that he may make a personal request, as well as dispose of some matters on the Speaker's table. The rules of the House make it the duty of the Chair to regulate the assignment of the committee-rooms to the service of the respective committees of the House. There are twenty-eight rooms now subject to the uses of these committees, while there are very nearly fifty committees now organized and working in this House. The labor of attending to this duty is now, and necessarily will continue to be, considerable. The Chair frankly says that he desires to avoid that labor, and the request he makes is that the House will do him the personal favor to order that this duty during the remainder of this Congress be assigned to the Committee on Accounts.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence on account of important business was granted for one week to Mr. JAMES B. REILLY, for one week to Mr. LORD, and for ten days to Mr. MACKEY of South Carolina.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DENISON, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Frank A. Page, on which there was no adverse report.

NEWPORT BARRACKS, KENTUCKY.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1055) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Newport, Kentucky, the grounds at the confluence of the Licking with the Ohio River, in Campbell County, Kentucky, known as Newport Barracks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HOLMAN. Last Monday, on my motion, there was referred, by unanimous consent, a bill for the relief of Mr. Harrison, to the Committee on War Claims. I understand that it should go to the Committee on Claims. I ask that that change may be made.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

CONSTITUTIONAL PREROGATIVES OF THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. WILLARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1056) to maintain the constitutional prerogatives of the several Departments of the Government; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

W. M. PLEAS AND F. S. JONES.

Mr. GOODIN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1057) for the relief of William M. Pleas and F. S. Jones; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OGLESBY. I desire to present the petition of 47 persons of Illinois, praying for the repeal of the two-cent United States check-stamp tax. This petition comes to me from Delaware in a circular signed by J. T. Heald. I have no other evidence or anything from the State of Illinois except that certificate with it, but supposing it to be genuine, I present it and move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to present a similar petition that comes to me in the same way, and I have only the same information in regard to it. It is signed by some 200 persons representing themselves to be of the State of New York, praying for the repeal of the law imposing a two-cent United States stamp-tax on bank-checks. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to take early action in repealing the two-cent United States check-stamp tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, in favor of the bill now pending making an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the centennial exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

I move that these papers go to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, and ask that it be read under the rule, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

He also presented the petition of William Kelley, of Decatur County, Virginia, formerly private in the cavalry service, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the memorial of Richard W. Adams, executor of Thomas M. Newell, deceased, praying to be paid interest on the sum of $1,455 from October, 1836, to March, 1857, that sum having been withheld from the pay of said Newell as commandant in the United States Navy by the Treasurer of the United States upon the judgment of a court-martial suspending him for the period of two years; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of citizens of Mississippi, praying for an extension of the time within which claims for losses suffered during the war and supplies furnished to the Army of the United States may be filed and prosecuted before the southern claims commission, or that a law be passed for their relief similar to the one passed for the relief of citizens of Tennessee who furnished supplies to the Army or suffered losses by the war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the State of Tennessee, signed by the officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of J. W. Brank, praying that his name be placed on the muster-roll of Company B, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of John E. Barrett, praying to be allowed pay as second-lieutenant of Company B, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, from March 1, 1864, to September 11, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of John L. Sheppard, of Missouri, for relief, claiming damages for false imprisonment. I presume it should go either to the Committee on Claims or the Committee on the Judiciary. I am not particular as to which committee it be referred to. It is a peculiar claim. This citizen was arrested for another party who was guilty of a crime in the State of Missouri—the murder of one of the United States marshals. There was a question of identity; he was not the man, and on satisfactorily proving that to the court he was discharged on a writ of habeas corpus.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair.) The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Claims, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of Captain Theodore Higgins, late of Company D, Twentieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying for the compensation of captain of that company from April 10, 1863, to July 4, 1863, while acting as captain thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present three petitions, signed by people whom I do not know, on the subject of the pension laws. I will remark, while I move their reference to the Committee on Pensions, that there is a marvelous similarity in this last edition of pension petitions which make them look to me as if they were the work of some claim-agent more interested than the pensioners are.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to give notice that I will, on the day after to-morrow, (Wednesday,) ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to the Mississippi election.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 274) for the relief of the registry of the circuit court of the United States for the fifth judicial circuit and district of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WEST. I suggest that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Claims, and that the accompanying petition from the owners of the bark Grapeshot be referred to the same committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to hear the bill read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill for the relief of the registry of the circuit court of the United States for the fifth judicial circuit and district of Louisiana:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to return to the registry of the circuit court of the United States for the fifth judicial circuit and district of Louisiana the sum of $15,861.51, gold, the said sum being now on deposit in the Treasury to the credit of said registry, with 6 per cent. interest per annum thereon from July 1, 1862, to be by said court distributed in accordance with its decree rendered in the matter of the bark Grapeshot.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It strikes me that that bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. It involves an inquiry into judicial proceedings.

Mr. WEST. That reference will be quite acceptable to me. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the accompanying papers, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I now ask permission to introduce a bill, which I feel it incumbent upon me to make some little explanation of, as its import will scarcely be demonstrated by its title. It is a bill amendatory of the several Pacific Railroad acts, the acts of 1862 and 1864, incorporating railroad companies and granting subsidies for the construction of a line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean.

When the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was rendered, the Congress of the United States and the interests of the people were confronted with the proposition that not only was the magnificent donation of bonds that was made to those companies involved irretrievably to the loss of the Government, but that the accruing interest for thirty years would so accumulate, according to the admission of the companies themselves, as to jeopardize and eventually involve entire loss. It would seem an appropriate occasion, therefore, that the legislative body of the Government should step in and adopt some measure which would have a tendency to prevent such a result.

I beg leave, therefore, Mr. President, to introduce a bill, and will explain its provisions in a few words. The act of 1862 originally stipulated that the entire earnings of the roads for Government business should be reserved as against the payment of interest and the principal of the bonds. By the subsequent act of July, 1864, one-half of that amount that was intended to be reserved was remitted, and at present the companies only derive the one-half of their earnings on Government business, and the other half is retained by the Government. Under the original provisions of the bill Congress was authorized at any time to alter or amend its provisions. Under the subsequent bill also, which granted a half of this amount of transportation, a like reservation was made on behalf of the Government. Evidently there is to be an accumulated loss, not counting compound interest, according to the argument of the Attorney-General of the United States, which would make $300,000,000; but, according to the admissions of the companies themselves, the Government of the United States, unless it interposes its power to protect itself, is to be mulcted in a loss of $180,000,000 by these companies. It is with that view and to check somewhat this irreparable ruin and to protect the Government of the United States that this bill is to be introduced.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 275) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WEST. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana whether there is any provision in this bill that whatever amount is saved from these railroads shall be given to the Southern Pacific?

Mr. WEST. I have not heard anything about the Southern Pacific in connection with this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I would like to have the bill read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of section 5 of the act of which this is amendatory as provides that only one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said roads be, and the same is hereby, repealed,

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act all compensation for services rendered for the Government of the United States by the Pacific Railroad Companies shall be applied to the payment of the bonds issued to and the interest paid and to be paid for said companies until the whole amount is fully re-imbursed to the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. What reference is proposed to be given to this bill?

Mr. WEST. I suggested that it be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably that is a very good committee, but by a resolution adopted by the Senate the other day the Committee on the Judiciary were required to examine into this matter to ascertain if the Government had any rights left whatever, and, if so, what measures should be adopted in order to secure those rights. The subject is one of very great importance. As the Senator states, there are over a hundred millions of money depending upon it; dividends are being declared by the companies; they have contested in the courts, and absolutely deny their liability to pay even the 5 per cent. reserved, declaring that they have made no net earnings, and in every way have placed themselves in a defiant attitude against the Government, who is their creditors; and, by the aid of low and prostituted papers, if an attempt is made by a Senator or a member of the House, or a movement by an organized committee, to bring these parties to account, it is denounced as simply the result of blackmailing efforts. It seems to me, in view of this condition of things, and the attitude of these parties, and the vast interests of the Government, and the fact that we should use, so far as we know, all means to procure a remedy of this condition of things, the Judiciary Committee ought to have charge of this whole matter, and ought to prosecute the investigation with the zeal which characterizes them, and bring some safety to the Treasury of the United States. I therefore suggest to my friend that the bill should go where the resolution did, to the Judiciary Committee, who have the matter fully in charge.

Mr. WEST. I can have no objection to that reference. My only object in asking the reference of the bill to the Committee on Railroads was that the Senate might have the advantage of the experience of that committee with reference to the subject, and perhaps bring more enlarged information before the Senate than otherwise; but at the same time it will suit my purpose equally well, which is to accomplish the same idea suggested by the Senator from California, should the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I therefore move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, in this connection I desire also to introduce another bill relating to these companies, and I shall be excused, I think, if I reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] whether these propositions are intended in the interest of the Southern Pacific Railroad. They are intended in the interest of the Government of the United States to protect it against what I think will be discovered eventually to be one of the most gigantic spoliations that ever was perpetrated upon it. I ask leave to introduce a bill now for the recovery from these companies of the amount of $3,000,000 of bonds of the United States, issued in violation of the limitation prescribed by law that no amount in excess of $50,000,000 should be granted to them.

There has been granted to the Central Pacific and to the Union Pacific Railroad Companies the sum of fifty-three million three hundred and odd thousand dollars in bonds, when the act itself specifically provided that no more than $50,000,000 should be given to them. In the mean time the Government of the United States has not only given them those bonds to that excess, but it has been paying the interest upon them since 1868, I believe, which is about the average of the issue, and it is bound to pay that interest up to the period of 1890. Consequently the Government has, by an erroneous construction of the law, first been deprived of $3,000,000 principal, and is now paying interest on that amount, and will continue to pay it until principal and interest shall accumulate to the amount of $10,000,000.

I believe, sir, that the case is perfectly clear, and that the provisions of the bill will commend themselves to the good sense of the Senate. I ask that the bill be read by its title. I had expected that it would be referred to the Committee on Railroads; but if it is desirable that it shall take the course of the other, be it so; but it is a somewhat different proposition. It is for the recovery of money and upon the construction of a railroad law, and I would prefer that it should go to the Committee on Railroads, and therefore I make that motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say to the Senator from Louisiana that I am most decidedly in favor of the bill that he has introduced in relation to recovering any interest that was paid by the Government of the United States from the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies; but I did not desire to be committed—as I understood there was to be a proposition introduced here and was not certain whether this was it or not—that any amount which might be recovered from these railroad companies should be devoted to a subsidy to another railroad further south.

Mr. WEST. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 276) to recover from the Central and Union Pacific Railroad Companies bonds and coupons issued to them in excess of the limitation prescribed by law; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 277) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions and to provide for the more thorough and perfect examination of claimants for pension; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 278) to amend the pension laws respecting the pensions of imbeciles and inebriates; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 279) to establish a land office in the southern part of Utah Territory to be known as the Beaver district, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 280) for the relief of Jacob A. Conover; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of John B. Davis for mail service from Memphis, Tennessee, to White River, Arkansas, in 1868, 1869, and 1870; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 282) authorizing the Harrison Arbor Company to excavate a channel and harbor in Mississippi Sound, and to construct docks and breakwaters in connection therewith; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 283) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the officers of the war with Great Britain of 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURMAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 284) to amend certain sections of titles 48 and 52, "Regulation of Commerce" and "Navigation and Regulation of Steam Vessels," Revised Statutes of the United States, pages 800 and 857; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 285) for the relief of Lewis D. Allen, of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

There was an adverse report in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the order cannot be made without unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. KELLY. I ask for the withdrawal upon leaving copies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That makes no difference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule excludes it unless there is additional evidence.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand my friend from Oregon simply desires to withdraw the papers, leaving copies. There is no rule, I understand, against withdrawing papers on leaving copies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I fear my friend from California is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an adverse report in this case. The Secretary will read the rule.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask pardon of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the rule read anyway. It is a good thing to do.

The Chief Clerk read Rule 49, as follows:

Whenever a claim is presented to the Senate and referred to a committee and the committee report that the claim ought not to be allowed and the report be adopted by the Senate, it shall not be in order to move to take the papers from the files for the purpose of referring them at a subsequent session, unless the claimant shall present a memorial for that purpose, stating in what respect the committee have erred in their report, or that new evidence has been discovered since the report, and setting forth the new evidence in the memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is clearly out of order. Does the Senator from Oregon withdraw his motion?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

COMMON UNIT WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a concurrent resolution proposing a common unit of money and accounts for the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the magnitude of the transactions in commerce and the intimate social relations between the people of the United States and of Great Britain and Ireland combine to recommend the importance of uniformity in the gold coins and moneys of account of the respective countries; and whereas, in existing circumstances, a change in the standard of the gold coins of the United States could be introduced without serious inconvenience, and the United States are willing to make such change, to the end of securing such uniformity: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President be requested to propose a convention between the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, having for its object to secure uniformity in the coins and moneys of account of the respective countries on the following bases, namely:

1. The money of account in each country shall be the dollar, which shall be represented by a coin formed of standard gold, whereof the pure metal shall be nine-tenths parts and the alloy one-tenth part, which alloy shall be of copper or of copper and silver, the silver not to exceed one-tenth of the alloy. The weight of the dollar of such standard gold shall be twenty-five grains and one-ninth of a grain troy, and shall contain twenty-two grains and six-tenths of a grain troy in pure gold. Gold coins of two and one-half, five, ten, and twenty dollars proportioned in weight, may also be issued, of like standard; and the convention shall provide what variations may be allowed from the exact standard of weight and fineness for such gold coins.

2. Subsidiary coins of silver, copper, or alloys of base metal may be issued within each country, of such standard and weight as may be provided by their respective laws, and representing cents or hundredth parts of a dollar, and other convenient decimal subdivisions thereof.

3. All accounts, representing transactions to be settled in coin, shall be kept in dollars and cents, or fractional parts of a cent. Sterling money shall be converted into dollar money by computing the pound sterling as equivalent to five dollars, the shilling to twenty-five cents, the sixpence to twelve and one-half cents, the penny to two cents, and the farthing to one-half cent.

4. All such gold coins conformed to standard, within the allowed limits of variation, shall be a legal tender within each country for debts and obligations payable in gold coin, excepting such as may have been incurred within the United States payable in gold coins of a former standard. The coins subsidiary to the dollar shall not be a legal tender or circulate as money beyond the limits of the country within which they are issued.

DEATH OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I take this occasion to give notice to the Senate that on Friday next resolutions in honor of the late Vice-President will be offered for the consideration of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 172) providing for settlement upon the lands known as the Fort Kearney military reservation, in the State of Nebraska; amendment the bill (S. No. 236) to amend section 3767 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the purchase of paper for the public printing.

JOINT RULES OF THE TWO HOUSES.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution reported by him from the Committee on Rules, originally submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS as a Senate resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint rules o ithe Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORTON, after the word "Congress" to insert the words "excepting the twenty-second joint rule."

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the effect of a joint rule is a question of exceeding interest, and I confess, for one, my want of knowledge of the precedents of the body on this subject. The effect of the present amendment to this resolution, so far as I have heard it, is to abrogate by the action of the Senate one of the present joint rules of the two Houses, adopted on the 6th of February, 1865. It relates to the exceedingly important subject of the count of the electoral votes. I am one of those who have always believed that this joint rule was unwarranted by the Constitution; that by it powers are assumed distinctively by the two Houses of Congress which are not only not expressly given, but which I do not think are fairly to be implied by the very scant language of the Constitution on the subject. At the last session of Congress the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] proposed an amendment of this joint rule. I think it was in the shape of a new joint rule, or perhaps it may have been a bill.

Mr. MORTON. The first movement was a rule and afterward a bill was presented.

Mr. BAYARD. The subject then underwent consideration in very little proportion to its importance. I said then, and I think still, that no time would be so fortunate for the settlement of joint rules between the two Houses of Congress as when the two Houses should be under the control of different parties. A subject like this should rise far beyond the possibility of partisan heats, and the propositions in regard to it and the settlement of those propositions should be made free from anything like the color of party advantage. That can be secured better where the two Houses are influenced relatively by different party feelings, and I do not see why a joint rule should not at least be proposed on this important subject and submitted to a joint committee of the two Houses to see whether or not a subject so full of grave importance as this cannot be mutually settled upon some acceptable basis not open to the objections which I think the present rule is open to.

Independent, however, of the question of the power of the two Houses of Congress over this counting of the votes comes at once the question whether a joint rule adopted by the two Houses falls and becomes void by the expiration of the Congress in which that rule was adopted. So far as the Senate is concerned it will not, I think, be suggested, because this is a continuing body; there is always and at all times a quorum continuing from one Congress to another. It is not so with the House of Representatives, the termination of whose legal existence is at the end of every two years. I should like to learn from those who have examined this subject, and are therefore much more competent to speak to it than I am, whether this has been the understanding or the action of the Senate; because from custom invariable, long-continued, reasonable, and just, the force of law almost is obtained. Certain it is that under this rule adopted in 1865 the electoral votes for President and Vice-President have three times been counted; and therefore it is a question of great importance for the Senate and the other House to settle whether a joint rule has a longer life than the Congress in which it is adopted, and whether upon the expiration of that Congress ipso facto the rule dies. So far as the Senate is concerned, we all know that the Senate's rules continue, but the question is what effect the different constitution of the other House of Congress has upon a joint rule. It is true that there is a very customary resolution of the House, made, I believe, at the opening of each new Congress, respecting the rules, and I believe at the present session of Congress the usual resolution was passed adopting the rules of the former Congress with two exceptions; but in the Senate I have no knowledge of any such practice, and the peculiar constituency of this body would make such a practice unnecessary, if not irregular.

I therefore trust that in this discussion gentlemen of longer experience in this body than I will state what has been the rule of the Senate upon this subject, and by what authority it is proposed that we should, on the incoming of a new Congress, consider that we have no joint rules at all without adoption. I would ask the honorable Senator from Indiana whether he has any precedent for the motion which he has now made, because by the precedents we may be instructed. In the term of service I have had here I know of no such case, and I only speak of it now as being a matter of importance that it should be settled correctly.

As to what we shall seek to substitute for this twenty-second joint rule, that is a matter for further and still more important consideration. But if it be true that, ipso facto, upon the expiration of the term of a Congress, the joint rules are all abrogated, then certainly we have been acting under a very different impression, because these rules have guided us from the time of their adoption, which has been years, running some from 1843 before my eye, and I find in the list a joint rule adopted on June 10, 1790—Rule 15. If there has been since 1790 no necessity, on the opening of each new Congress, to re-adopt the joint rules that guided the preceding Congress, then we should be making a very remarkable innovation upon the practice of the Senate, and I, for one, always prefer to know that a change, when it is to be made, is to be a reform before the change shall be adopted. I would ask the honorable Senator from Indiana if he will not favor us with some explanation in regard not only to the custom of the Senate but that which has become under custom the unbroken practice of the Senate on the subject of joint rules.

Mr. MORTON. In answer to the question of the Senator from Delaware, I will say that I have made no examination so far as that point is concerned.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, Mr. President, it scarcely seems to me well that we should in the absence of examination proceed to the affirmance of a proposition for which, as yet, no authority in the way of precedent has been suggested.

I have expressed my disapproval of the twenty-second joint rule. I did it at the last Congress, and gave my reasons more at length then than now. I feel that it is a subject of very grave importance, that should be deliberately settled, and no time was ever more fortunate for that settlement than the present. The relative differences of political opinion between the two Houses of Congress render it especially the time when we should adopt a rule which shall be beyond the suspicion of party feeling or party advantage. It touches one of the gravest questions in our Government, and one in regard to which there is a silence on the part of the Constitution that, in my opinion, is very much to be regretted. The importance of establishing a tribunal which shall be capable of lifting itself beyond the excitement and the heats that follow a vigorous political contest in a popular Government like ours cannot be overestimated. Where precisely to find such a tribunal is a subject of difficulty. As the Constitution now stands, there is a conspicuous absence of provision to guide the two Houses on this subject. The question whether the duty of the Vice-President in opening and counting in the presence of the two Houses the electoral votes that shall be sent here is one purely ministerial, or whether it has in it a judicial discretion scarce lower than any confided in any officer of the Government, or whether the two Houses in whose presence he is to count these votes are simply to be silent witnesses, merely in their turn ministerial officers, for the purpose of throwing around his count a protecting formality—these are questions which the Constitution has not wholly solved, and with regard to which very different opinions may well be entertained.

For these reasons I propose to submit a motion for the postponement of the consideration of this subject for one week, until next Monday, not at all for the purpose of delaying action, but for the purpose of treating a subject of this kind with the gravity which I think its importance demands. We ought to know more of the effect of joint rules; we ought to know more of the term in which they are operative, because in the very hasty consideration which I have given this subject I have shown that rules existing to-day were joint rules at the very foundation of the Government, as far back as 1790, and have remained without re-adoption from that time to this. It is a question whether it be necessary to have a re-affirmance of those rules at each session, and what the powers of the Senate are in retiring from a joint rule without the coincident action of the other House. It is to have time for consideration that I submit the motion to the Senate now that this resolution be postponed for one week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I do not rise to join in this discussion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. Is there objection to continuing the discussion of this question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I was about to suggest that the officers of the Treasury Department are preparing statements in explanation of the points made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] and that they will not be ready for use in the Senate until to-morrow, and therefore I prefer that the resolution of that Senator, which was under consideration at the last day's session, shall lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from North Carolina continuing his remarks on the resolution called up by the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MERRIMON. I simply wish to say that the Committee on Rules were unable to ascertain that there was any departure on the part of the Senate from the uniform custom of continuing the joint rules from Congress to Congress. The long experience of our Chief Clerk, embracing about thirty-eight years, knows of no exception, and as far as he has been able to learn, on examination, there has been no exception.

Mr. MORTON. No exception to what?

Mr. MERRIMON. No exception to the practice that the joint rules continue from Congress to Congress on the part of the Senate. But when the matter was brought to the attention of the Committee on Rules we could not see how any rule, whether joint or otherwise, of one Congress could be binding upon a subsequent Congress, for the Congress as a Congress lasts but two years. As a legal proposition, if a joint rule is not binding upon the House, how could it be binding upon the Senate? We thought one House of Representatives could not by its own mere construction imply an engagement on the part of a subsequent Congress. The committee went on the ground that if a joint rule was not binding on a subsequent House it could not be binding upon the Senate in connection with a subsequent House, for an engagement with one Congress is no engagement with another Congress. It seems, as the venerable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] stated on a former occasion, that this matter has passed uniformly from the beginning of the Government down to this time without question. The question is now raised, and if to-day some action of Congress should be required under the joint rules, and a Senator should rise and say "I object," there would be the end of it. It is only by common consent that the practice to which I have referred has prevailed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it seems to me very clear that these joint rules must fall, as has been stated, with the end of the Congress. I suppose that they have been continued for a course of years by acquiescence; that if business occurs, and both Houses recognize these rules, the Chair would recognize them as if they had been adopted by the two Houses. Therefore it is important that this subject be considered now, or within a few days, so that Congress shall not, by acting under these joint rules, be committed to them again.

I agree with the Senator from Delaware that the twenty-second joint rule is very objectionable. Therefore it seems to me to be the part of wisdom to adopt the joint rules, leaving out the twenty-second, which is not agreeable generally, I think, to the Senate, and then adopt some rule as a substitute for it. If we leave the rule as it is, everything is unsettled; we must have another rule. It is uncertain, as the matter is left in the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, whether the President of the Senate acts merely ministerially or whether he acts judicially. The law says he is to open the certificates, and the votes then, in the presence of the two Houses, are to be counted. Counted by whom? Who is to determine whether a vote is lawful or not? Does it require both Houses of Congress acting separately to admit a vote, or are they to be presumed to be lawful votes, so as to require both Houses to reject them? There are a great many questions involved, and it seems to me that this is a propitious time and that it is our duty to fix this question, so that that danger to the country resulting from the present uncertainty shall be removed. I therefore, while I have personally no objection to a postponement for a day or two, think the true policy of the Senate is to adopt the joint rules excepting the twenty-second rule, and then address ourselves to supplying the great deficiency that exists.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senate knows very well, so far as it takes any interest in my opinions, that I do not think well of the twenty-second joint rule, and at the last session of Congress I stated what I thought were valid objections against it. But I do not propose at this moment to go into that discussion. That will more properly arise when some substitute for it shall be offered, for a substitute might be offered that would be worse than the rule itself. I rise simply for the purpose of expressing one idea that has occurred to me, and that seems to me worthy of consideration.

The resolution now before the Senate rests upon the assumption that the joint rules of the two Houses fall at the end of what is called every Congress, and that they must necessarily do so upon the theory that the House of Representatives expires at the end of every Congress, while it is said that the Senate is a perpetual body. Why is it said that the Senate is a perpetual body? I know of no reason except one, and that is that only one-third of its members go out every two years, so that there is always a sufficient number of Senators in office to constitute a quorum of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion, for I want really the information he may be able to give me in reply to it?

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. Congress expires upon the 3d day of March, and the Executive convenes the Senate upon the 4th day of March, while the succeeding session of the House may not commence until the December following. Now does not that necessarily make the Senate a perpetual body? Is it not a body liable to be convened for some of its duties, for executive duties, at any day, at any hour, when the Executive shall have occasion to convene it?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from Maine had waited, he would have found that I should have considered that very question.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senate is said to be a perpetual body, because it can be convened at any instant. I say, in reply to the Senator from Maine, that the Congress of the United States can be convened at any moment. In the contemplation of our Constitution there is never one moment of time when there is not a Congress of the United States which can be convened upon the call of the President, and in point of fact it is so; for although some of the States have been accustomed to elect after the 4th of March, as the State of Connecticut, and perhaps the State of Kentucky, yet the great majority of the States elect before the 4th of March, in the fall preceding the 4th of March of the odd year; and I believe that, under an act of Congress which we have passed, and which will go into effect after 1876, all the members of the House of Representatives will be elected before the 4th of March of the year when a Congress expires. But there never has been one day, I believe, since the inauguration of this Government when a quorum of the House of Representatives has not been elected and a Congress could not have been convened upon the call of the President; and I say the theory of our Government is that all the departments of the Government, executive, judicial, legislative, are in existence at every moment of time. A department of Government is not the less in existence because some seat may be vacant in it. There is no less a Supreme Court because there may be a vacancy on the bench of that court. There is no less a Chief Executive because the President may die. There is no less a Congress because seats on this floor or in the other House may be vacant. No, sir; the theory of our Government is that there is a Congress always in existence, and the fact is that there is such a Congress; that at no time, perhaps in all our history has there been a single moment when, upon a call of the President, a lawful Congress of the United States could not have been assembled.

It therefore does seem to me that this division into Congresses, the Forty-first, the Forty-second, the Forty-third, and the like, is simply for convenience, and arbitrary. It follows the old English idea of a Parliament. There was a time when all the statutes passed at a session of Parliament were considered as one statute, no matter how long the session lasted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are given by the years of the reign of the king.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, by the years of the reign; and we call our Congresses the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and the like, though the British Parliament is not so called; but that is simply for convenience. It is convenient for reference; it is convenient for purposes of speech; it is convenient for other purposes perhaps; but the fact remains that upon the theory of our Government and according to the actual history of the Government there has always been a Congress in existence. There is none the less a Congress in existence because the members of the House of Representatives who are elected may not come here and take their seats. They are members of Congress. They draw their pay as members of Congress long before they are qualified. They are entitled to certain privileges as members of Congress long before they are qualified. They are entitled to privilege from arrest in coming to the seat of Government to take their seats. They were, when the franking privilege was in existence, entitled to frank long before they were sworn in. They are, in contemplation of the Constitution, members of Congress; and therefore it is true as I said, and said perhaps too often, that, in contemplation of the Constitution and in the real truth of history, we have always had a Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I am listening to what the Senator says with interest, and I beg to suggest to him that the Constitution and the law date the term from the 4th of March.

Mr. THURMAN. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. It shows that there is no such hiatus as is supposed, and therefore no necessity whatever for the theory that the House of Representatives has died the death and been buried, so that there is a time when there is no House of Representatives, and hence that it is necessary to re-enact the joint rules.

Nor does this idea of mine at all impinge upon the right of each House to make its rules to suit itself. That was relied upon very much, and some remarks of the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives were read by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] the other day, in which it was supposed that to allow the rules of the House of Representatives to continue in force without a re-adoption would be to infringe the rights of the present House of Representatives. With great respect for that authority—and no man respects it more than I do—I must say that it is not satisfactory to me.

The Senate is said to be a continuing body. Cannot we change our rules whenever we please? The House can change its rules, no matter whether the rules of the last House continue in force until altered or not. In respect to the joint rules, the same authority that made them can change them. They were made by the joint authority of the two Houses, and, in my judgment, they remain until the joint authority of the two Houses alters them.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, not by way of combating his argument, but a question the answer to which may throw some light on this subject? I beg to ask the Senator whether the present House is in any sense a continuation of the old House for any purpose?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know that I quite understand the argument. If the judges of the Supreme Court were all to die to-day, and their successors should be appointed to-morrow, it would be still the same Supreme Court, although the individuals would be changed. The members of the House of Representatives are in a great measure different from those of the last House of Representatives, but still it is the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. Its character does not depend on its personnel; its character does not depend on the individuality of its members; it is the House which, according to the true idea of the Constitution, is a perpetual House, whoever may constitute the individual members of that House.

These ideas have occurred to me in regard to this subject, and I throw them out for what they are worth. If they are sound, (and it seems to me they are,) then the joint rules remain until they are altered by the authority that made them. What gives great strength to this view of the subject is that I understand from those who have spoken before me that that has been the practice of Congress from the first day of its existence down to this time. I am told—I do not know how true it is, for I have not looked into it—that it never has been considered necessary to re-adopt the joint rules. Certain I am that under this very Rule 22 the electoral votes were counted once since I have been a member of the Senate, and immediately before I took my seat in the Senate. At the last election they certainly were counted, and the rule was enforced, and enforced with very singular results, and very unsatisfactory ones, too, as we all know—enforced to the exclusion of the votes of States which one branch of Congress thought ought to be received, and the other thought not, and decisions were rendered that were contradictory in themselves it must be admitted. And the fact that no time whatever was allowed for discussion, no opportunity for information; that you could not even read a paper for the purpose of enlightening the Senate as to how it should vote; that we were not permitted even to read the constitution of the State of Arkansas to show what was the great seal of that State these facts are quite sufficient to show how that rule operated. But yet the rule was enforced, for it entered into the mind of no man to suppose that that rule had been abrogated; and yet, if the position that is now taken be true, that rule was not in force, and all our action rejecting certain votes in Arkansas, and in Texas I believe, and certain votes in Georgia, was wrong, and all that was unconstitutional, and our action was void.

Certainly upon a question of this kind, such long usage, such an interpretation of the Constitution as has obtained for over eighty years, from the end of the first Congress to this time, ought not to be overturned unless we be most clearly convinced by argument that is totally unanswerable that that interpretation was wrong. I think that interpretation was right. I think this idea that there is a dead House of Representatives every two years is all a mistake. I think the House of Representatives is as permanent a body as the Senate. The fact that we hold our offices for six years and they for only two makes no manner of difference between the two Houses as to the permanent nature of the body. You might as well say that there was a difference because some members hold for shorter terms than others. That makes no difference at all.

In view of these facts I hope, in order that this subject may receive a graver consideration, a more thorough consideration than it is likely to do if we vote upon it at once, that the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware will prevail and that the resolution will go over until next Monday, so that the subject may be more thoroughly considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no objection to the proposition of my colleague that action on this subject may go over to a future time, but I think it would be very well to debate it now; and my impression is that the more it is considered the plainer the Senate will find its path to agree without any material difference upon the solution of this question. It seems to me rather a simple one.

The rules of the House of Representatives, I believe it is conceded on all hands, expire with the Congress. There can be no doubt about that; because that has been the universal practice of the Government, I believe, from the beginning. While I was a member of the House there were two or three important occasions when, before the House was organized, it was held that there were no rules. The hour rule, so necessary in the government of the House, was abandoned during at least two periods of stormy contest; and it was agreed on all hands that the rules of the House of Representatives expired with the Congress, and that no law, no act of Congress even, could prevent it. An act of Congress cannot extend the rules of one House to another, because the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, declares that each House shall make its own rules. In the famous interval that occurred between the meeting of the House by which Mr. BANKS was elected Speaker and the time when he was elected the question was raised whether the rules at the last House were in force; and it was held, without an objection, that they were not—that they fell with the expiration of the Congress adopting them; and for nine weeks any member could speak nine days, if he had the power to do it; and one or two members did speak for one or two days, many for four or five hours. There were two cases of that kind; so that, by the established practice of the Government from the beginning to this hour, it has been held that the rules of the House of Representatives expire with the Congress, and that no law can operate to extend the rules from one Congress to another; because that would be to violate the Constitution itself. In this respect the rules of each House are precisely alike. The rules of the Senate are no more operative than the rules of the House of Representatives. We have the power to change them at any moment. It is said that this body is a continuous body; but these rules need not be written out in the form of rules prescribed in set phrases. The great body of the rules of all parliamentary bodies are unwritten law; they spring up by precedent and custom; these precedents and customs are this day the chief law of both Houses of Congress, and they continue from time to time by acquiescence, but at all times within the control of either House.

It was held in one case by common consent that, when there were no prescribed rules, the general parliamentary law, as laid down in Jefferson's Manual, was the rule of the House of Representatives. This was in the absence of all written rules; and perhaps certain customs that had sprung up in parliamentary practice in this and in all other countries where there are deliberative bodies would be held to be rules even in a town meeting convened anywhere and at any time. So there are hundreds, and I may say thousands, of rules in every parliamentary body that continue from time to time by acquiescence and consent; but those customs or precedents may at any time be changed either by the Senate or the House.

I have come, therefore, to the conclusion that it is not necessary, so far as the joint rules or the rules of the Senate are concerned, to take any action at the beginning of each Congress, simply because the joint rules expire by the expiration of Congress. It is not necessary for us, to continue any of our rules, to adopt the usual resolution of the House at the beginning of every Congress. I believe the joint rules will be continued without any such action. The Senate itself is a permanent body, and all the rules which affect the Senate continue until changed by the action of the Senate. But the Senate at any time can change its rules. Is there any doubt that the Senate can change any existing rule of the Senate? Not at all. Now, can the Senate change the joint rules of the two Houses? I have not the least doubt of it.

Mr. BAYARD. Without the co-operation of the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I would not have engaged in this debate, not having examined the question critically, but that I heard my colleague say that these joint rules had some power or weight or influence which the rules of the House or the rules of the Senate had not. The joint rules of the two Houses are but the concurrence of the two Houses upon a mode of proceeding to conduct the public business. They depend upon the continuous consent of the two Houses, and either House can withdraw its assent at any moment from one of these joint rules. The joint rules only prescribe the mode of doing business when the two Houses are brought in contact with each other, when they are passing bills backward and forward; but still there is no power in Congress to prescribe a rule either for the Senate or for the House. Each House must prescribe its rules; and, sir, we have just as good a right to change a joint rule at any moment as we have to change the simplest rule of the Senate; and so the House of Representatives have a right at any time to withdraw their concurrence to any joint rule of the two Houses.

"Each House," in the language of the Constitution, "may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior," &c. The Senate has said that in a certain stage of a bill when we send it to the House of Representatives we may ask for a committee of conference, and has prescribed the mode in which that conference shall be had. We can at any time withdraw our assent to that mode of holding a conference with the House and propose another, and that is the end of the joint rule, because these joint rules must not only be adopted by the concurrent votes of the two Houses, but that concurrence must be continuous, perpetual, and constant; and either House may at any time withdraw its assent. Otherwise there is a power in the two Houses in Congress assembled to prescribe rules, and not the power in each House to prescribe its own rules. If we do not choose to hold a conference with the House in the mode pointed out by the joint rule, we have a right to change that rule and adopt our own mode of conducting business between the two Houses, and ask again at any time, and every day if we choose, the assent of the House to some modification of the joint rule.

That is the view I take of this question. Now, in regard to the resolution of the Committee on Rules, I do not think it is absolutely necessary to renew our assent to the joint rules at all. But since this question has been presented in such a way that we are able now to withdraw our consent to the twenty-second joint rule, I am perfectly willing to vote to continue all the other joint rules, and I think we ought now by common consent to avail ourselves of this opportunity of withdrawing the assent of the Senate to a rule that may revolutionize our Government at the will of a mere party faction. I say this without the slightest partisan or political feeling in this matter, for there ought to be none. The joint rule is so framed that any factious majority of either House, impelled alone by political feeling, may destroy the Government, as I understand the rule. It has been read so often by my friend from Indiana that it is not necessary for me to read it again. By it, either House, without debate, without inquiry, without any chance whatever for protest, may prevent the counting of the vote of any State that it chooses. That is the operation of it. Either House may object to the counting of the vote of a State on a mere informality of a seal or the like, and in this way a majority of either House, if they will be governed by factious motives, may defeat the election of a President of the United States, and may create in this country a civil war.

Sir, a rule of that kind or that may have that effect, that would have that effect if there was any party bad enough to do such a thing, ought not to stand in our book of rules. It seems to me it is a great deal better to avail ourselves of this opportunity now presented to get rid of the twenty-second joint rule and then let the Judiciary Committee or some other committee report some method by which we may conduct the business of examining the election of President of the United States without endangering the very safety and stability of our Government. I shall therefore vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, on the ground not that these joint rules are not now in force just as much as they ever were, but on the ground that we have a right now and at every hour of our session to withdraw our assent to a rule improvidently passed, and thus break the concurrence which gives force and vitality to a joint rule. I shall therefore vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana and shall vote for the proposition as amended, although I do not think the original resolution was necessary to continue in force the joint rules.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, since this resolution was reported on the 10th of this month I have taken occasion to examine the Journals both of the Senate and House of Representatives, commencing with the second session of the First Congress, and I find that during that long lapse of time the Senate has never considered it necessary to adopt the rules of a previous Congress, probably for the reason which has been stated, that it is always an organized body; that is, it always has a quorum to do business. Being an organized body it has never since 1789 adopted the rules of a previous Congress. On the other hand, the House of Representatives at the Second Congress, in 1791, adopted a resolution continuing in force the rules of the preceding Congress until such time as they might be changed; and so the uniform practice of the House of Representatives continued to be from that time down to 1869. The resolution adopted at every Congress was similar to the one adopted the other day by the House, in some such words as these:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the last Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered.

The House of Representatives at every Congress down to 1869 adopted a similar resolution. It was first omitted in 1869; it was also omitted in 1871; it was again omitted in 1873. During the three Congresses beginning in those years the customary resolution was not passed. It was proposed on the organization of the present House of Representatives that the old rules should be continued in force. The resolution was in these words:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered, except Rule 166 and Rule 167.

A member from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] raised a question of order whether it was necessary to adopt the old rules, holding, as I presume he did, that the action of the previous House of Representatives had so far abrogated the ancient usage that it was unnecessary to adopt them. Having made the point of order, the Speaker overruled it, stating that each House had a right to adopt its own rules and that the rules of the preceding House all fell with the Congress. Now, with all due deference to the ruling of the Speaker, I think it was erroneous. I cannot see why the rules of the House of Representatives of a preceding session may not continue at the organization of a new House. Their continuance does not preclude that House on organizing from changing the rules. It can do it just as easily as a court of justice can. Every man who has practiced in courts knows how it is there. The laws of Congress provide that the several courts, the district court, the circuit court, the Supreme Court of the United States, may make rules regulating their proceedings when not inconsistent with the laws of Congress. Can it be presumed that those rules expire whenever the court may adjourn, or in case a district judge or a circuit judge dies and a new judge is appointed? Do not the rules continue from one term to another? Their continuance does not preclude the court from changing its rules. No more does it preclude the House of Representatives from changing the rules of the preceding House whenever it may choose to do so. The Constitution certainly gives to "each House" the right to "determine the rules of its proceedings," and until action is had the rules of the preceding House, like Jefferson's Manual, are part of the law of the House, which continue until they are changed.

Mr. DAWES. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. KELLY. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Oregon has called the attention of the Senate to the fact that since 1869 the House of Representatives has never by express vote re-adopted its rules. Has his attention been called to the fact that, I think in 1868, an attempt was made by a rule to make the rules of the preceding House binding upon the subsequent House until otherwise ordered? There was such a rule adopted about 1868, according to my recollection, and from that time until the present session of Congress there has been no action taken by the House, but sub silentio the old rules have been considered in force. I do not think there can be any great binding effect in that rule adopted about 1868; but under the operation of that rule of the House of Representatives the rules of the preceding House have been considered as the rules of the next House until some express action has abrogated them. I infer from reading the RECORD that it was the design of the present House to do away with the rules which were excepted in the resolution there adopted. The object of it was to do away with the effect of those two rules, and I should infer that the mover of that resolution was of opinion that unless such a resolution was adopted, excepting those particular rules, all the rules of the last House would continue under the rule adopted, as I say in 1868, or when the rules of the House of Representatives were submitted to a new committee and revised. The inference I draw from the movement in the present House is that even the mover of the resolution there supposed that without an express exception of the two rules which he desired to abrogate, they would like the rest be binding upon the present House of Representatives.

Mr. KELLY. My attention was not called to the rule which has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. I only examined the Journals of the House, and I found, as I stated, that the customary resolution was not passed for the three Congresses before this, that the rules of the preceding House should be considered in force and obligatory upon the House until they were abrogated. With all due deference to the opinions which have been expressed on the other side, and with all due deference to the ruling of the present Speaker of the House of Representatives, my own judgment is that the rules continue in force until they are abrogated or annulled or otherwise determined by the existing House of Representatives. It is one House of Representatives; it is a continuous body; that is to say, the House of Representatives is the co-equal of this portion of the legislative power. It never falls. It is true the members come and go; it is true that at each Congress new members appear; but still the House of Representatives as a part and parcel of the Government is as existing as the Senate itself. As I view it, the principle applicable is the same that applies to a court of justice. Adjournment does not annul it. A new judge coming to sit on the bench does not abrogate the court or its rules. Neither does the expiration of the terms of members of the House of Representatives abrogate the rules so far as the new House is concerned.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLY. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. To test the rule on which he claims to predicate his argument, I beg to inquire of the Senator whether he goes the length of saying that it would be competent for the present Congress, including both branches, to continue the business pending in the two Houses at the close of the late Congress in this, and act upon it as pending business?

Mr. KELLY. No, sir; for a very different reason. Each House may determine the rules of its proceeding, but each House cannot legislate of itself. Each House has unquestionably the power to determine the rules of its own proceeding; but I contend that the House of Representatives having established certain rules, reason says that they should continue in force until the succeeding House shall change them, and that succeeding House may change them at any time, at any day, at any hour of the day, conforming of course to its rules in making the change.

But, Mr. President, as I said, the almost unbroken usage of the House of Representatives seems to have been to adopt a resolution continuing in force the rules of the House of the preceding Congress. That is eighty years of usage, and perhaps that ought to go for something; but if usage does amount to anything, if it expounds a law, if it establishes a rule, why should it not do so in this case? As I said before, neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives in eighty-six years has considered it necessary to re-adopt the joint rules. Nay, more, we are practicing under these joint rules every day; we have been acting under them at this session of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to refer him to the rule which I stated had been adopted by the House about 1868?

These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congress, unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. KELLY. Very good; but I consider that that really did not continue them in force. I contend that no House has a right to prescribe rules for a subsequent House which shall be binding on it. I consider that they are in force without any rule. But, as I said, if usage does establish anything it ought to establish that it is unnecessary for us now to adopt this resolution, because here are certain joint rules adopted on the 6th day of August, 1789, and we are practicing under these rules every day, although they have never been re-adopted by either House of Congress. Look at the first one:

When a message shall be sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, it shall be announced at the door of the House by the Doorkeeper, and shall be respectfully communicated to the Chair by the person by whom it may be sent.

Is that not done every day? Has it not been done at this very session? Is it not in force now?

Again:

The same ceremony shall be observed when a message shall be sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate.

Again:

Messages shall be sent by such persons as a sense of propriety in each House may determine to be proper.

We send them by our Sergeant-at-Arms.

Again:

When bills are on their passage between the two Houses they shall be on paper and under the signature of the Secretary or Clerk of each House, respectively.

We have been practicing on that. We cannot get along without it. We must have some rules of this kind, in order to communicate with the other House. Now, pray how are we to adopt even a simple resolution unless we have the right to communicate with the other House? And if we do so we do it by virtue of these joint rules. The very necessity of the case shows that they are in continuous operation and ought to be. As I said, if unbroken usage from the commencement of the Government down to this day can establish anything, it ought to establish that it is not necessary for either House to re-adopt the joint rules in order to continue them in force for the present Congress.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have always understood the theory of the two Houses to be this: first, that the Senate is a continuing body. That results from the nature of its organization, and also because it is a part of the executive department of the Government. We have had some discussion here within a few days involving that very question. When the Senate adjourns from one session to another it is nothing more than a recess of the Senate. It does not differ in point of law from an adjournment from Thursday over to Monday. The officers all continue. We have just decided that a President pro tempore of the Senate elected at a former session continues to be President pro tempore when the Senate meets in a new Congress. In that way we have recognized the continuous character of the Senate; but I believe I have never before heard it said that the House of Representatives was a continuing body. The Senator from Ohio says that in that respect it is precisely like the Senate. The organization of the Senate is never lost; all the officers continue. If we have a Vice-President he continues during his term. We have a President pro tempore, a Sergeant-at-Arms, and a Secretary, and they continue until the Senate itself makes a change. Therefore the organization of the body is not lost, and every adjournment of the Senate is simply in the nature of a recess. But, Mr. President, that is not the case with the House of Representatives at all. In the House it is just the reverse. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] says that a member of the House is elected for two years. So he is. That is the term prescribed by the Constitution. He says that he is paid when Congress is not in session. First he was paid a per diem only when Congress was in session; afterward it was changed to a salary by the year; but that certainly does not affect the question of the legal existence of the House. We speak in general of "Congress," two years. But so far as the legal existence of the House of Representatives is concerned, how can we conceive of that when the members have never come together, their credentials have never been examined, and they have no officers elected? There is no House of Representatives until it is organized. There may be the elements of organization; the members may have been elected, but that has not been officially ascertained, and cannot be until their credentials have been examined by the proper officers. It occurs to me that it is illogical to talk about the House of Representatives being in existence before it is organized. It has no Speaker; it has no officers; it is utterly incapable of doing anything, while the organization of the Senate continues. Therefore, Mr. President, from the 4th of March last until the first Monday of December there was no House of Representatives; there was only one House of Congress in existence, and that was the Senate of the United States. There can be no joint rules unless there are two Houses. It is absurd to talk about a joint rule when the House of Representatives is not in existence. A joint rule implies the existence of both Houses. How a joint rule can be binding on the Senate when there is no House for it to be binding upon I cannot understand.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. KELLY] says that it has been the unbroken custom for eighty years for the House to enact its own rules at the beginning of every Congress. Undoubtedly. They have taken it for granted that when one Congress expires, and the House goes out, the new House comes in just as if there had never been a House of Representatives before. This House is just as independent of the House that went before it as if it was the first House in the First Congress. It is a new House; it has to make its own rules and I will suggest to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that, although the House did once adopt a rule extending the rules of one House to the next House, clearly it had no power to do that.

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean to intimate myself that I thought it had.

Mr. MORTON. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose they meant when they made that rule to suggest that by common consent and acquiescence the old rules should be considered as continuing.

Mr. MORTON. We have an evidence of what the understanding of Congress was in regard to that in the fact that Congress provided by law for the organization of the new House, declaring that the Clerk of the old House should make out the roll and call the House to order and organize it. It is not competent for one House alone to prescribe the method for organizing the next House. Therefore Congress passed a law providing for the organization of the new House; and when the House is organized, then its rules are entirely within its own control. It may make new ones just as if there had never been a House of Representatives.

The argument of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] I submit to him, defeats itself. He says the House of Representatives is a perpetual body, just like the Senate. Well, the House of Representatives has always assumed that it made its own rules; it has adopted rules at the beginning of each Congress, showing that in its judgment the rules of the former House were not binding upon it. The two Houses stand upon the same footing, and that would be the law also in the Senate; the rules of the Senate at a former session are not binding at the next session, and the Senate consequently must adopt its rules at the beginning of every session. It seems to me, if the Senator's reasoning is good, it precisely repels the conclusion that he wants to draw, for, if the two Houses are perpetual and both stand upon the same footing, and the House of Representatives must re-enact its rules at the beginning of every session, then the Senate must re-enact its rules at the beginning of every session, and there is no such thing as acquiescence.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate may acquiesce in these rules. It has acquiesced in them. That is one method of adoption; but it must be an acquiescence in each particular rule. Acquiescence in one rule, I submit to my friend from Oregon, is not acquiescence in all of them. Acquiescence in a simple rule in regard to the performance of the duty of the Clerk of the House in coming here to announce the passage of bills by the House is not acquiescence in the twenty-second joint rule. The Senate may acquiesce in a particular rule, but that is not acquiescence in the whole body of them.

This resolution brought forward by this committee repels the idea of acquiescence. It is proposed to put the acquiescence of the Senate in the form of an affirmative resolution, and in that resolution I propose to strike out the twenty-second joint rule. In my judgment, that rule is unconstitutional. It is a monstrosity. It is the most dangerous machine for the purpose of bringing revolution upon the country that was ever invented. What is it? It provides that, when the two Houses come together to count the votes for President and Vice-President, if any Senator or Representative gets up and makes an objection to counting the vote of the State of Kentucky, for instance, though it may be of the most frivolous character—actually contemptible in its nature; it may be technical only—but if the objection is made, the two Houses then separate, and each House votes upon the objection. If the objection is sustained in one House and overruled in the other, the vote of the State is thrown out. It gives one House the power to disfranchise a State, and in fact to disfranchise all the States in the Union.

Do you believe that it is in the power of the two Houses by a joint rule to confer the authority upon either House to reject the electoral votes of every State in this Union upon objections the most frivolous or contemptible? We had an illustration of that at the last time the votes were counted. Some member of the House, I believe, objected to counting the vote of Arkansas, upon the ground that the certificate showing the election of the electors and how they voted did not bear the great seal of the State. We separated and voted on it. The House of Representatives overruled the objection, as it ought to have done. In the Senate we had no opportunity of discussion. There could not be a word said. It was not even in order to read a provision from the constitution of Arkansas, and the Senate sustained the objection, upon the ground that the seal was not the great seal of the State. The certificate did bear a seal, but, as near as we could see—it was somewhat dim—it appeared to be the seal of the secretary of state of Arkansas. There could not be a word of explanation made, and consequently we disfranchised half a million of people in about ten minutes. I learned upon inquiry afterward that that seal was all the great seal the State of Arkansas ever had; but under this rule no explanation could be made, and the Senate without consideration—if it was respectful, I would say without sense—disfranchised the State of Arkansas. Therefore I think it is that we ought not to acquiesce in this respect. It is a question, as remarked by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] above all party considerations.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator a question in regard to the origin of this rule. There must have been some reason for the adoption of such a joint rule by the two Houses of Congress. I had not the honor of a seat in this body at that time, and know nothing about the considerations presented to the Senate, and I should like to know what were the considerations presented for the adoption of this joint rule.

Mr. MORTON. I once undertook to examine the history of this rule, and found it was adopted in both Houses without a word of debate, without any consideration. My friend from Oregon [Mr. KELLY] remarks that that shows the importance of debate. It was adopted in 1865, in a stormy time, to meet an exigency that it was thought then might occur. I do not justify the adoption of the rule under any circumstances. There was a somewhat curious incident connected with it, and without mentioning any names, I will state it. I was talking to a distinguished Senator, not now a member of this body, about the rule, and I called his attention to its dangerous character. He agreed with me; he denounced it as strongly as I could possibly do, and after he had made his statement in full I called his attention to the fact that he was the author of it. He had entirely forgotten it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not concur in all that I have heard on this question. I differ from the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I do not regard the House of Representatives as being at all times an organized body. While it is true that the House of Representatives is one of the departments of this Government, yet there are periods when there is no organization of the body, according to the view which I take, and the members of the House of Representatives in each Congress have the right to adopt their own rules, and the rules provided by the previous Congress are not obligatory upon them. But I do not concur in the views expressed by the other Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that it is competent for this body to annul, at pleasure, any joint rule between the two Houses. The view which I take of these joint rules is that, as they require the concurrent action of both Houses, they partake of the nature of a statute, and that neither House may annul a joint rule without the concurrence of the body that helped enact it. I therefore do not believe that it is competent for the Senate of the United States to annul the twenty-second joint rule, nor do I believe that it is competent for the House, after its having been enacted or ordered by the concurrent action of both Houses, without the concurrent action of both Houses to render it null and void. This is the view I take of the joint rules.

Mr. MERRIMON. Does it not require the enactment of each branch of Congress to renew the joint rules?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think it requires it. I think they stand on the statute-book binding and obligatory upon both Houses of Congress, however they may be constituted, until by the concurrent action of both Houses they be made null and void.

Now, with reference to the dangerous character of the twenty-second joint rule, I do not hesitate to say, after some reflection, that in my opinion that joint rule ought never to have been adopted. I believe that the interests of the people of this country were safer under the constitutional provision referring to the count of electoral votes for President and Vice-President than they have ever been under the twenty-second joint rule, and I can well conceive how by its operation it may produce much trouble in the country at some future time. It is therefore obligatory upon Congress, and there is no more appropriate time than the present session of Congress, to provide some more eligible mode for ascertaining the wish of the people of this country in reference to their President than is done through the operation of this rule. But while that is true, and while my judgment in reference to this rule is that it is most dangerous, and ought to be superseded by something more equitable and fair and less dangerous in its operation, I do not hold that the Senate by simply striking it from among the joint rules can make such action have the effect of a joint rule, unless their action is concurred in by the other House of Congress, remarking, as I before did, that it was adopted by the concurrent action of the two Houses, and it must be repealed by the same authority that enacted it.

With these views, Mr. President, while I am ready to strike it out at any time whenever there is a substitute provided by both Houses, I do not believe that it is incumbent upon us to proceed with the subject at this moment; but, if I could make a suggestion that could reach the ear of the Senate, I think the whole question ought to be referred to a joint committee composed of members of both Houses, to provide some substitute for this joint rule, or to take some action in reference to the joint rules generally.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to ask him a question in regard to this matter? This joint rule was passed in February, 1865. Was it ever signed by the President, or was it simply passed by the action of both Houses?

Mr. MORTON. It was not adopted as a joint resolution. It was simply adopted as a joint rule by concurrent resolution. It did not require, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, the concurrence of the President. It was adopted as one of the joint rules of the two Houses by concurrent resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. And never was signed by the President?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has it been approved directly since, or simply acquiesced in?

Mr. MORTON. It has simply been acquiesced in by action upon it on three occasions.

Mr. COCKRELL. Am I to understand that there has been no objection made to it, and no action taken in reference to it?

Mr. MORTON. No action taken in reference to it at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. In regard to repealing it or continuing it; but it has been acted under?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir. The Senate passed a bill here at the last session, which I had the honor to introduce, changing the rule; in other words, making it a law requiring the concurrent votes of both Houses to reject an electoral vote. That passed the Senate but did not pass the House.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I hope the motion I have submitted will prevail. The discussion we have listened to has shown the importance of further consideration of the subject. I hope the consideration of the question will be postponed for a week. I will only say now in response to the Senator from Indiana that I do regard the present power which has been assumed by the action of Congress over this subject as utterly unwarranted by the Constitution. Virtually as we are now acting under this joint rule and as Congress has acted for the last ten years, a veto founded in nothing but caprice is vested in the Senate or vested in the House, to defeat the result of the popular vote for President and Vice-President. Such has been the state of affairs under which the people of this country have lived for eleven years, and it is in the power of the Senate or of the House under the assumptions of this rule to throw the election into the House by refusing to have the votes counted for any pretext whatever. Such a state of things is simply monstrous; such a state of things has been monstrous all the time it has continued. The people of this country have held their elections three times for President and Vice-President with the power under this rule vested in either House of Congress to defeat the popular will indirectly by creating the other House of Congress the electoral college itself. That has been the effect of it. I say it ought never to have been the rule; it was a violation of the spirit and intent of this form of government that such a rule ever should have been adopted or acted under. I have no doubt of that and that such power ought not to be given; and I will ask it no more for a House of Representatives with whom I have political sympathy than I would for those to whom I was entirely opposed.

This shows me the necessity of approaching a subject that has been dealt with so unwisely and so unwarrantably with great gravity and with a desire to place it beyond the possible reach of influence of political ambition or political design. Our duty in respect to counting the electoral vote is a constitutional duty. The Constitution is very scant in the phrase that conveys it and unsatisfactory in its silence; but it does seem to me that, when you are to make the Constitution operative, it should be by the forms of legislation, by a law duly passed by each House of Congress and which the Constitution requires shall be presented to the President of the United States.

"The President of the Senate," under article twelve of the amendments to the Constitution, "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." There is the beginning and the end of constitutional provision on the subject of the count of the electoral votes; but that it ever was intended to submit that count to the control of either House of Congress, so that either could substitute the House of Representatives for the will of the people, I do not think can be contemplated by any one who desires to be just in his construction of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to call the Senator's attention to a fact. In 1857, when the two Houses met to count the vote for President and Vice-President, objection was made to the counting of the vote of Wisconsin, upon the ground that it was not cast on the day prescribed by law. The Constitution expressly requires that the electoral votes shall be cast on the same day in every State. The debate showed that that was regarded at the time as material to prevent collusion between different electoral bodies. In the State of Wisconsin a snow-storm prevented the electors from meeting on the day fixed by law to cast their votes; and it would appear that the objection ought to have been good; but the President of the Senate pro tempore, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, refused to entertain any motion upon the subject and declared that the only thing in order was to count the votes, and the votes were counted. The two Houses separated. A very animated discussion took place in each upon the question of this power. It was assumed by some Senators that the two Houses had the right to determine upon the legality of the vote; by others that the President of the Senate had the whole matter in his hands. No conclusion was come to, and the question was dropped.

Mr. BAYARD. All that confirms what I have attempted to state—the embarrassment which surrounds this subject owing to the silence of the Constitution and owing to the fact that the Congress of the United States has not seen fit to provide machinery for making the Constitution operative according to its limitations. Instead of that we ran along under the act of Congress providing for the day of election to which the Senator has just referred, passed, I think, in 1845, providing for the election taking place on the same day all over the country to avoid fraud; we ran along without anything to regulate the count until 1865; and then this rule which has been so justly stigmatized by the honorable Senator from Indiana was adopted. It has been acted under; and its evil effects have not been sufficiently considered until the present time. I am not to be restricted in my condemnation of a constitutional act by any of the accidental circumstances in which party relations may be found between the two Houses. If the time shall come that, in the face of an admitted election by the people of the men of their choice for President and Vice-President, the action of any House of Congress or of both Houses of Congress shall seek to forestall and defeat it by throwing the election into the House of Representatives, I trust in God that the people of this country will not submit to it. The question is a very dreadful one, and I do not believe, I cannot believe that any man's fortunes politically would be so desperate as to invite such dishonest action as could lead to any such result. It is enough to suggest such a thing to make us all start back in horror from it; and as we shrink from it, so I think we should provide laws that will make such things impossible, so far as we can.

But, sir, I have said already more upon this subject than I meant to say. What I have said was in the most unprepared way. I think this subject needs discussion, grave discussion, high discussion, and therefore I trust the Senate will allow it to pass over for another week until gentlemen shall not only have made up their minds in regard to the abrogation of this rule, about which I have no question, but also in regard to the settlement of the other matter which gentlemen of ability here have differed about, as to the power of the Senate to recede from a joint rule. I confess, in opposition to some gentlemen whose opinions I do always give great weight to, I cannot read the language of the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution without considering that it is in the power of either House, at its will, in accordance with its own rules, to determine those rules. The force of the language used in the Constitution is fully to be regarded: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." "Determine," from the very force of the word used, is to "put an end to the rules of its proceedings." No one doubts its power in regard to its rules for its separate action. How can it be doubted in regard to the share of action which we take conjointly with another body; for if the rule was to be permanent ought it not to have received the sanction of the President or have been presented to him for his concurrence under the seventh section of the same article which requires that "every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill." If, therefore, a joint rule does require the concurrence of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, it should be presented to the President. If it does not require that, then it is not passed under any authority of the Constitution. There is in the Constitution, so far as I know, no provision whatever on the subject of joint rules; and in reasoning upon it we must reason by analogy. Nor has there been, so far as I have been able to discover, any legislation on the subject of joint rules. It has been simply the construction that under the power given to each House to determine the rules of its proceedings it may consider its proceedings in connection with the other House as well as its own separate proceedings; and if it may, under the language of the Constitution, determine those rules, it seems to me it may put an end to those rules; otherwise the language would lose much of its force. I am sure there were no idle words placed in the Constitution.

I hope, sir, that this matter may be continued that we may approach it with more knowledge and more reflection. Therefore I ask for the postponement.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio, usually seated farthest from me, [Mr. THURMAN,] affirmed, if I understood him, that the Government of the United States in all its branches does not exist occasionally but always. Pointing the statement as he did, the legislative branch of the Government of the United States always exists, and one House, as well as the other of the two Houses composing that branch of the Government, always exists. For one, I see no occasion to dissent from that statement, or that opinion if it be an opinion. I think the history of the Constitution and the statutes passed under the Constitution warrant the Senator in that declaration. It is true that the House of Representatives, in one sense, comes into existence on the 4th of March in every alternate year. I did not remember, when the Senator began speaking, the origin of that. Had I trusted to my recollection I should have misstated it probably. On looking, I find in the history of the Constitution that on the 17th of September, 1787, in convention at Philadelphia, resolutions were adopted which, among other things, committed to the Congress, then being the Congress of the Confederation, the duty of determining the day on which "proceedings should begin"—that, I believe, was the phrase—"under the Constitution," when the Constitution should be ratified. That resolution provided that upon Congress taking action and making publication, the electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected; that the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of President and should transmit their votes certified, signed, &c., as the Constitution requires, "to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution." Under that authority, derived from the convention, the Congress on the 13th of September, 1788, adopted a preamble, which I omit, and this resolution:

Resolved, That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several States which, before the said day, shall have ratified the said Constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States and vote for a President; and that the first Wednesday in March next be the time, and the present seat of Congress the place, for commencing proceedings under the said Constitution.

That Wednesday in March happened to be the 4th day of March, and a meeting took place, of Congress, under that resolution. One of the first acts passed was what we came afterward to call an apportionment act, and I believe all the acts have followed each other in this phraseology: that after the 3d day of March of such a year "the House of Representatives shall be composed as follows," and then the acts proceed to declare so many members from this State, so many from that, and so on, thus taking always the 4th of March as the initial point (it having been established in the mode to which I have referred) and as commencing the existence of each particular House of Representatives, speaking now of the personal composition of that House. Thus it comes to be true, as I ventured to suggest to the Senator from Ohio, that, by operation of the Constitution and of the statutes, every Representative in Congress, no matter when he may be elected, whether in August in Kentucky or previously in some other State, holds his office from the 4th of March and holds a term which by law begins on the 4th of March, and it begins at twelve o'clock on that day. I see, looking at the Manual, that on one occasion a Senator from Virginia, Mr. Mason, the hour having passed midnight on the 3d of March, doubted his right to continue to sit; and, his credentials showing his re-election having been presented, he presented himself and asked to be sworn, and the Senate resolved that by the operation of the Constitution—that was the language of the resolution—his term of office, and of course the term of other members expiring at the same time, expired at twelve o'clock meridian on the 4th of March. Thus it seems to have been established that every member of the House of Representatives holds from the 4th of March till the 4th of March two years, and thus it comes to be that in fact, in reality, the House of Representatives in its personal composition is dissolved once in two years; but that fact, as I understand, does not in any way interfere with the legal intent, the theory of law, the constitutional fact that the House of Representatives, as one-half of one of the departments of this Government never dies while the Government lives.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think that that conclusion influences particularly the power of the Senate upon the question before us. It certainly does not lead me to think that the joint rules which have prevailed between the two Houses continue to prevail without action and in spite of either House. I do not stop to discuss the question suggested by some Senator whether either House of its own motion pending the life-time of the joint rules can put an end to those joint rules. I should say, however, as an impression derived from analogy in other cases, that, if it be true that when the House of Representatives, upon the meeting of what we call a new Congress, adopts rules it adopts them for two years, and some of those rules are concurrent rules and the Senate concurs in them, that compact, that action, read in the light of its implications and surrounding circumstances, very cleary implies that two years is the term for which that concurrent action is to continue, that that is what both parties mean, and that that is the whole vigor and effect of the action which they place in their book of rules. If that be so, it is a little difficult to see how either House upon its own motion, any more than either party to a contract upon his own motion, without the assent of the other party to that covenant or contract, can turn around and break it.

That question is not important for the vote I may be called upon to give now. I dispose sufficiently of the whole question as it presents itself to me by turning to the Constitution and finding that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States," and so on, and by seeing further that "the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year; and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day," as it in the beginning was determined by law and as it has been since. I find my way sufficiently clear when I see that once in two years the members of the House of Representatives are rechosen, not some of them but all of them, thus supplying anew the whole personnel, the whole incarnation (if I may so speak) of that House. Now, by settled usage in that case, in analogous cases, and by usage, as it seems to me very clearly within the attributes and within the prerogatives of the House, each Congress (as it is called for convenience, as the Senator from Ohio says) proceeds to take its own orders, to make its own rules under the express permission of the Constitution of the United States. When the Senate concurs in a joint rule, a concurrent rule, the Senate assents to the making of rules by the House, if they proceed from the House, extending as to those rules to this body. It assents by adopting them as a part of its own rules. Should any House undertake to make rules to govern a succeeding House, I conceive the action would be entirely nugatory; and, if so, it follows as a matter of course that a rule made by one House, although the Senate may be a party to it, if it is designed to bind a succeeding House, is as void as it would be were it a rule for the House alone. Certainly the House would have no greater prerogative, no more far-reaching prerogative in the establishment of a rule, if it happens to be a rule to which some other body is to be a party, than it would have were it a rule for the government of itself, supposing all the time that it be a rule in the strict sense of that word as distinguished from a statute or from that kind of joint resolution which a Senator over the way had in mind when he inquired whether the signature of the President had ever been attached to this rule.

If I be right in that, Mr. President, it is very clear that in every Congress as it is called, (adopting again this term for convenience) the House of Representatives is obliged to adopt rules in some form for its government; and it is very clear that the resolution referred to by the Senator from Oregon, adopted by the House at the commencement of the session, was an expedient, competent, and orderly proceeding. If that resolution covered, as perhaps it did, the joint rules of the two Houses, it brings to us the question whether we will adopt those joint rules. Now, undoubtedly it would be competent for the Senate, sub silentio, (as the Senator from Massachusetts said touching another matter,) by acquiescence, by that silence which implies consent, to go on and observe the joint rules. That it seems has been done repeatedly, perhaps usually, before. It would have happened now very likely but for the fact that every Senator who has regarded this subject at all cannot have failed to feel that we were called upon to take some action touching the twenty-second joint rule, which it has been said by the Senator from Delaware and by other Senators involves very grave dangers. A resolution was offered by the Senator from Vermont—for what reason of course I cannot know—bringing to our attention the question not whether if we simply by silence allowed these rules to drift they would be for all purposes of convenience and for all purposes of technical regularity an authority, and, if you please, the rules of the Senate, but whether, if we saw fit to abstain from adopting them or to insist that they be changed as a condition to adopting them, that power resides in the Senate.

Now, I cannot see how there can be any question in that regard. I cannot see how the fact that the legislative branch of the Government, like the judicial and executive branches, never dies until the Government itself expires, but is, in theory of law, ceaselessly in existence, bears at all upon the question whether we can change or impairs our right to change, if we see fit to do so, the concurrent rules of the two Houses on every one of those periodical occasions when the House of Representatives must speak if it wishes to have rules or must by some mode of action adopt the rules which existed, or else be left entirely without anything to govern its proceedings except the general rules of parliamentary law which pertain to all assemblies and of course to all deliberative bodies.

I therefore shall vote to adopt all those joint rules to which no objection has been pointed out. That includes them all, I believe, except the twenty-second joint rule. It seems to me we should have joint rules on other subjects; and the fact that we have them in no way delays or embarrasses our action touching that. I am very clear myself that that rule should be changed, and some Senator or some committee will no doubt be prepared, when we get to it, to suggest some substitute for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday next.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, in the close of the very able discussion of this question by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] he referred to a conversation had by him with a distinguished gentleman who had been, as I understood, a member of the Senate, and in that conversation he presented his objections to the twenty-second joint rule, and the gentleman with whom he was conversing, and whose name he did not give, objected as seriously to the twenty-second joint rule as he did, and on being informed that he was the author of it he was perfectly astonished. Further, during the course of this debate it has appeared that a measure of the utmost consequence, a measure by which a whole State may be disfranchised, a measure by which many States may be disfranchised, a measure which may, by fraud or otherwise, turn the entire effect of a presidential election, and therefore revolutionize the Government, passed through both Houses of Congress without discussion and was denounced most bitterly by the very man who drew it. That was a singular presentation of the case. It shows me the importance of discussing all questions of this character with care and patience.

Sir, there can be no question whatever that each House is the judge of its own rules of proceeding; and, being the judge of its own rules of proceeding, it necessarily has the right to change those rules of proceeding without the concurrent action of any other body. But there is an additional class of rules, over and above this, which affect the Senate alone, and affect the House alone, and which are called joint rules. About them, how is it? It is contended that without action of the Senate whatever, without re-adopting the joint rules by acquiescence, they become for all purposes joint rules binding on both Houses. That is a question which may perhaps admit of serious controversy. This, however, is true: that, while you have joint rules such as we are now discussing, those joint rules, to be effective as rules, must have legal action by each of the bodies to be bound by them. That is clear.

It is said that the House of Representatives is a continuous body; and that reason is assigned by a Senator for whose legal judgment I have great respect; but I do not concur in it; I do not think it is true. I believe that there is a cessation of the organization of the House of Representatives every two years. The very fact that this body requires the President of the Senate (whoever that may be) to call the Senate together, that it is a perpetual body, that it never ceases to exist, that while one-third goes out every second year one-third comes in at the same time, makes it a perpetual body; and the history of the Parliament of Great Britain on that question is precisely carried out in the Constitution of the United States. As far as the House of Representatives is concerned, the whole of that body goes out every two years. No one whatever is left in. There never is a time, there never has been a time since the organization of this Government, that two-thirds of the Senate were not in existence. It is, therefore, a perpetual body, so laid down in all the works on the subject. The House is not so. It is true of the House of Lords; it is not true of the House of Commons. Precisely what is true of the House of Lords is true of the Senate; precisely what is true of the House of Commons is true of the House of Representatives here. If, then, the House of Representatives goes out every two years, as each House has the right to make rules for its own proceedings, how is it possible that one House may make rules for its successor? If one House cannot make rules for its successor, if it has not the power legally under the Constitution to make rules for its successor, I ask how it can make rules for its successor in conjunction with this body? I cannot understand how that can be done.

Now, in so far as the question as to the joint rules, with the exception of the twenty-second, is concerned, I have not one word to say. In so far as this twenty-second joint rule is concerned, I have sufficient knowledge from this debate for myself to say that there may be a dangerous power to the existence of this Union by granting to one or the other of these two Houses the power to destroy the political interests and the elective franchise of an entire State, and not only of one, but of many.

If that be true, it is clear that this question should be submitted to a committee appointed on behalf of the Senate, with a request that a corresponding committee be appointed on behalf of the House of Representatives, and let that committee be composed, as far as this body is concerned, of its best men, and let them adopt a system which will obviate all of the dangers which have been spoken of by all sides. So far as I am concerned personally, it is a question above and beyond all political parties. It is a question that involves the very integrity of the Union, for here is a function which may confer unjustly and improperly the power to strike down the power in the electoral college of a State or of many States; and what may be of value temporarily for one party may be destructive to the entire country.

I regret that I have consumed so much time of the Senate, but the question is so important that I hope I shall be excused. I trust a committee will be appointed consisting of experienced Senators, of such number as may be thought proper, to take the subject into consideration and to join a committee to be appointed by the House of Representatives, and when their report comes in we may perhaps get a rule which will be without danger.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have listened with great pleasure and instruction to the remarks of my friend from Texas; but there is one of his propositions to which I cannot assent. If I understand him, he says that the House of Commons and the House of Representatives stood precisely alike in regard to their duration, and that the House of Lords and the Senate are precisely alike; that both the Senate and the House of Lords are perpetual bodies, and that the House of Commons and the House of Representatives are not. There is this difference between the House of Commons and the House of Representatives: it very seldom happens that the term of office of the members of the House of Commons expires by efflux of time. In the last two or three hundred years, very seldom indeed has a House of Commons sat its whole seven years, since the Parliaments have been septennial, or its three years when there were triennial Parliaments. The usual mode of ending the House of Commons is by dissolution, and that where there is the most perfect concurrence between the Throne and the House of Commons. Prorogation does not put an end to the House; dissolution does.

The point of difference between the House of Commons and the House of Representatives is this: the House of Commons is really dissolved and then writs go out for a new election. There is at the end of each House of Commons a period of time when there are no members of the House, and when therefore the Queen cannot convene Parliament on any day whatsoever when she might be pleased to do so. But that is not the case with the House of Representatives. There never has been, I believe, one day since the organization of our Government in 1789 up to this time when there was not a House of Representatives that might be convened. That makes the difference, it seems to me.

While I am on my feet I will say that I think there is great force in the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas. I do not know but it is the wisest thing that can be done to have a joint committee of the two Houses on the subject of these joint rules, and then it can be determined whether or not to bring in a bill to regulate this matter and make it an act of Congress, or whether we can agree upon a joint resolution that shall remove all dangers which we think are pressing upon us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to postpone the further consideration of the subject until next Monday.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I do not desire to interpose any objection to a proper delay and a proper discussion of this subject, but Senators all know that at so late a day in the session certainly we have never before known so few legislative matters brought to our attention. We have done less than has ever before been done at a session up to this period, and every Senator must see that in a very brief period of time there will come before us various subjects which will demand and must receive our consideration; and it is wise and well that we make all proper progress in the settlement of this discussion now before us. I do not believe it best to postpone it for a whole week when it may be crowded out by other matters of public moment which will demand our time. I have no objection that this question shall go over to to-morrow. I know of nothing very particularly demanding the attention of the Senate then. I am aware that the question in which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is participating is one that will come up; yet I think we had better keep this matter distinctly before the Senate, and if we can settle it fairly to-morrow let us settle it; if not, let us continue its discussion until we shall close it and determine what shall be the judgment of the Senate.

Now comes the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to me and suggests that there is a bill that he wants to bring up to-morrow. I shall co-operate with him. It only illustrates the position which I take, that there will come upon us continually various measures from various committees demanding our attention, and it is wise and best that we dispose of this question at this time. When I say "this time" I do not mean this day, but that we do not postpone it for a whole week; that we consider it to-morrow, and if to-morrow be not sufficient time then continue its discussion until next day, and until it is settled and determined. These are my general views in relation to the postponement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I venture to suggest that it be postponed to Wednesday.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, Mr. President, if there be no further matter before the Senate to be offered here to-day, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business and let this resolution remain as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will give way to-morrow in order to pass the bill of which I gave notice this morning, very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. My motion has precedence, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and thirty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

AMNESTY.

Mr. WHITE. The morning hour having expired, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so as to enable the House to proceed forthwith to vote on the passage of the following bill:

A bill to remove the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That all persons now under the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, with the exception of Jefferson Davis, late president of the so-called Confederate States, shall be relieved of such disabilities upon their appearing before any judge of a United States court, and taking and subscribing, in open court, the following oath, to be duly attested and recorded, namely:

I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of a citizen of the United States.

The House first, however, voting on the following amendment thereto:

Strike out the following words: "with the exception of Jefferson Davis, late president of the so-called Confederate States."

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that there cannot be a vote on a bill and amendment under a suspension of the rules; that the vote must be on the final passage of a proposition intact.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Not just yet.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] may be distinctly stated. I have not exactly understood it.

Mr. RANDALL. My point of order is that, while it would be in order to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it is not in order to move to suspend the rules to proceed to vote on an amendment to a bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania must remember that we have many and many a time so suspended the rules that an order could be executed in a particular way, and then the order was given. That is the motion in this case: that we so suspend the rules as to take two votes: first, on an amendment striking out certain words and, secondly, on the whole bill, whether the amendment is stricken out or not.

Mr. KASSON. In other words, the point of order is made under a rule when the resolution is to suspend the rule and declare a certain thing in order which is not so under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point before the rule is suspended.

Mr. KASSON. That cannot be done.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I submit that it is not regular or according to the rules of this House that a gentleman can offer a bill and move to suspend the rules upon that bill and an amendment to his own bill, at the same time including them in one motion. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] offers a bill and an amendment to his own bill together, which I submit is not in order.

Mr. HALE. What is there that the House cannot do under a suspension of the rules, if two-thirds choose to do it?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The gentleman must move one distinct proposition on which he asks the House to suspend the rules. He cannot move two propositions at the same time.

Mr. HALE. He can make a motion to regulate the order of proceedings, and that, I apprehend, is precisely what the gentleman from Kentucky is doing. He proposes a certain order of proceedings, and moves that the rules be suspended that that order may be adopted.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman from Kentucky introduces a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. Then he proposes to amend his own proposition, and moves to suspend the rules upon that. I submit that that has never been done in this House.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman who introduces this bill evidently intends this purpose: that the rules be suspended so that the House shall vote, if they are suspended for the introduction of this bill, on two propositions: first, to strike out certain words which stand in a printed bill of the House and, secondly, on the passage of the bill, whether the words are stricken out or not. That is certainly competent to present in a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BLAINE. No doubt of it.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, without making any criticisms upon the form in which the gentleman from Kentucky has put his resolution, it is not competent to exclude any part of his proposition from the consideration of the House. The Chair must therefore regard the latter words of the resolution as it is introduced as constituting in fact a part of the preliminary words, and as in substance therefore stating that the desire of the gentleman from Kentucky is to introduce this bill for two purposes: first, that there shall be a vote upon a proposed amendment, and, second, that there shall be a vote upon the bill itself, whether amended or not. It is suggested that it is not competent for the gentleman to do this under a suspension of the rules; but in response to that the Chair will suggest that the very purpose of a suspension of the rules is to get rid of all rules and to let the House run as freely as it pleases. The Chair overrules the point of order and holds that the motion is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. If the rules are not suspended, I shall make a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the suspension of the rules so as to bring the bill before the House.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. KASSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE. Before the question is taken, I would like to make a statement by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDEN, and Mr. WOOD of New York, and others objected.

Mr. WHITE. I only desire to say that I would vote for the amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 111, not voting 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Blaine, Blair, Bland, Bliss, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. MILLS. I desire to say that my colleague Mr. CULBERSON is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. COOK. Mr. WILLIS, of New York, requested me to state to the House that he has been called home unexpectedly.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order of business.

REDEMPTION OF UNITED STATES LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to suspend the rules for the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is unwise and inexpedient at this time that a specific and arbitrary period should be prescribed by law at which legal-tender notes of the United States should be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury in coin; and therefore the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payment," approved January 14, 1875, ought to be repealed; and the Committee on Banking and Currency is instructed at as early a period as may be practicable to report to this House a bill for that purpose.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to refer that resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. I move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. HALE. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Would it be in order for me to inquire of the Chair the effect of this resolution, and whether it would not be the most politic and wise course for this House to refer it to a committee and defer action until we have had a report on this important question?

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution is not open for debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The resolution is in the form of an imperative instruction to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 158, not voting 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF RULES—APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. COX. The Committee on the Rules have directed me to report, in response to a resolution of the House, the following amendment to the rules:

That Rule No. 120 be so amended that all after the word "progress" be stricken out and there be added the following:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

If there be no objection to this rule, I will call the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Is this reported for immediate action?

Mr. COX. It is presented as the report of the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. KASSON. I object to its being acted on without debate and consideration of the clauses to which the proposition refers.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I raise the question whether this is in obedience to any resolution of the House.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that a resolution embracing a proposition of this kind was sent by the House to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. HOAR. I think we are entitled to have that point determined by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. According to the understanding of the Chair, the Journal shows that an amendment of this kind was offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and referred to the Committee on the Rules, with a direction to report at an early day. This report is a response to that reference.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to have Rule 120 read as it now stands.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government.

Mr. COX. Now I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which in the Digest immediately follows this rule, and gives an interpretation to a portion of the rule which the committee have thought proper to strike out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Digest the construction which has been placed on this by previous Speakers of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill which changes an existing law. But it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose.

Mr. COX. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I can state to the House in a very few words the object of this amendment as I understand it. We propose to modify this rule because, as the Committee on the Rules believe, or at least as I think, a forced construction was put upon a portion of the rule, under which any salary was allowed to be increased, though the opportunity was never given to decrease a salary. Now the committee propose to go "right about face" and adopt a rule that will make it in order at any time to reduce salaries, or to retrench the expenditures of money by Congress if the object of reduction or retrenchment is germane to the bill itself.

Mr. HURLBUT. Under the modification of the rule now proposed, will not entire control of appropriations for the Army, and in effect the control of the whole military establishment and all the laws relating to it, be placed in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RANDALL. I will explain that. The opportunity will be given to the Committee on Appropriations to submit to the House propositions looking to retrenchment, but the adoption of those propositions will be subject to the will of the majority of the House. And why not?

Mr. HURLBUT. The proposed rule will practically abolish all committees except the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. The majority of this House is responsible in connection with the expenditures of the Government. I will say (for I have no concealment to make) that my object in assisting to report this amendment was to retrench the expenditures of the Government in every direction.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] allow me a word? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] misapprehends this matter somewhat. As Rule 120 now stands and as it has always been interpreted, the Committee on Appropriations have had the same power in one direction which it is now proposed by this amended rule to give them in another direction. Heretofore the committee might under the rule increase salaries—whether salaries in the military or naval establishment or salaries of civil officers. The only effect of the proposition now submitted is that we shall be able to retrench expenditures on an appropriation bill.

I sought the opportunity to get a proposition of this kind before the Committee on the Rules in the last Congress; and it was then considered I understood that quite a number of gentlemen on the committee then thought that such a rule ought to be adopted, or at least that the existing rule should be so modified as to operate in both directions—not only to allow increase of expenditures in a general appropriation bill, but also to permit retrenchment. Certainly the rule ought not to be a one-sided one, allowing the increase of expenditures but not permitting retrenchment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the point which has been made in regard to the existing rule that it allows an increase of salaries to be in order but not a decrease, is a point well taken; and I have long thought that the rule ought in that respect to be changed. On this point I agree entirely with the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] During the last four years I have felt very much embarrassed by the fact that here on the floor amendments increasing salaries must necessarily under that rule be declared in order, while any amendment to reduce salaries would be ruled out.

I think, however, that the rule as now proposed to be amended goes very far beyond that; and if it be properly understood, I do not believe the House will be willing to adopt it in its whole scope. For instance, suppose a bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government is before the House and some one proposes to abolish ten or fifteen missions. Now, by all custom at all times in the history of this House, such a motion would be ruled out of order, because it would change the law in so far as there was any law to regulate that matter. But as I understand the rule now proposed, it will allow the Committee on Appropriations to re-organize the Army, to re-organize the Navy, to re-organize the Treasury Department, in short to recast all the legislation concerning the public service, not merely as to the amount of money to be appropriated, but as to the size and conditions of that service.

At the last Congress complaint was made by many members here that the Committee on Appropriations had altogether too large a jurisdiction. Gentlemen will remember the proposition was submitted to refer the Army appropriation bill to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Navy appropriation bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, because it was said this Committee on Appropriations covered everything and rendered obsolete the other committees of the House. At any time, if we propose to change the law, any of these committees, or indeed any member of the House, can make the point of order and have the provision ruled out, and that was urged as a reason why our power was not so great as it was charged. Of course we were not shorn of power, as was proposed last winter, and we ought not to have been. But, sir, to give this added power to the Committee on Appropriations would, in my judgment, be a bad thing.

Mr. Speaker, what can we do as the rules now stand? Exactly what we have done year by year. Let the Committee on Appropriations, as they will frequently have occasion to do, say "We think this or that part of the service should be changed," report a certain change in the law, and then on Monday ask that provision be made in order to one of the appropriation bills under a suspension of the rules. In this way you bring before the House the specific thing you wish to change in the law, and the House authorizes you to do it. But to give this Appropriation Committee such a general sweeping power now is substantially to render obsolete the power of all the other committees of the House.

Of course the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will see I do not say this in any possible sense to oppose retrenchment of expenses. I will join him most cheerfully in all genuine retrenchment.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] allow me to say a word?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the object of the proposition now before the House, as it has been stated, seems to me to be right. The purpose is that, as the rule, or the construction of the rule, now gives the House the privilege of amending an appropriation bill by increasing salaries, it shall likewise give to the House the privilege of decreasing salaries. That is stated to be the object, and so far it is a good one. Am I right in stating that to be the object?

Mr. RANDALL. It is.

Mr. BANKS. Now it seems to me the amendment goes a little further than that. Here is a word which admits of a very dangerous interpretation. I refer to the word "germane." "Nor shall any provision in any such bill, or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order except as being germane."

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

Mr. BANKS. I know it is right if it is understood.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a technical word.

Mr. BANKS. But suppose the appropriation be for a consulate. As it is now in order to increase the appropriation, it should be equally in order, as the gentleman contends, to decrease the appropriation if the House thinks that should be done. But will it be in order to add other consulates and other parts of the diplomatic service to that one under the idea that they are germane, as I think they would be?

Mr. RANDALL. Any increase, I admit, would have to come in under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BANKS. Why should not the rule be stated in this way——

Mr. RANDALL. We want to give it one push in the way of retrenchment.

Mr. BANKS. And that you shall have. We will push you as far as you choose to go, even—as I hear suggested behind me—to cut down the salaries of members.

Mr. RANDALL. We will meet that issue at the proper time.

Mr. BANKS. Why should not this bill say that when an appropriation bill is before this House for consideration it shall be in order either to increase or diminish that specific appropriation? That will remove all doubt about the interpretation and give the power which the gentlemen seem to ask.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to say a word in this connection. Of course rules are adopted and interpreted with reference to the particular condition of things at the time of their adoption. It is manifest that it is desirable the rules shall be so applied that legislation under them asking for increase of expenditures shall only be allowed to come in when a two-thirds vote has been obtained for that purpose. Such restriction is imposed upon legislation in many of the States, so that increase of expenditure in certain directions can only be allowed where a two-thirds vote has been given in its favor. This simply proposes in so many words that an existing law shall not be changed except by a proposition germane to a general appropriation bill which shall retrench expenditures. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will perceive, that leaves the question of increasing expenditures as the question of retrenchment existed heretofore. It leaves the committee or members of the House to move a suspension of the rules on Monday to bring the subject up for consideration. This, as gentlemen perceive by close examination of the proposition, while it carefully avoids going beyond the subject-matter of the bill to consider subjects or to treat them as amendments, at the same time proposes only to consider such amendments, such original propositions as, being germane to the bill itself and to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures, leaving all questions of increase to come in under suspension of the rules as heretofore propositions came in to decrease salaries. It just exactly reverses the practice heretofore existing for so many years under the one hundred and twentieth rule of the House.

Mr. BANKS. The apprehension of the House, and what I feel is the danger, is that this amendment will scoop all legislation into the Committee on Appropriations; and that I believe the Committee on Appropriations do not claim. If the rule as reported is changed in the way I suggest it will stand as the committee wanted, and gives the power which I think they ought to possess:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill, or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order, except it be to retrench, to increase, or to diminish the appropriation that is recommended.

Will not that satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts certainly will recoguize the fact that, so far as a particular appropriation is concerned, you may increase or diminish always in Committee of the Whole. So far as that specific appropriation is concerned the question whether you can or not is not involved here.

Mr. BANKS. The proposition will then be to give the committee the power to increase or to diminish, to en'arge or retrench, expenditures. That ought to be done.

Mr. COX. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts draw up his amendment to the rule and have it referred and considered. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to another point which I think, unless I am wrong in making the point, may induce them to adopt a different method of reaching the result they have in view. It is this: that they strike out altogether the last sentence of the existing rule. The existing rule says:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Then the rule, as it at present stands, goes on to say:

And for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government.

Now, if they strike out that sentence, it is not in the power of this House to make any appropriation, either originally reported or as an amendment, for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government, unless it is for an expenditure previously authorized by law. Take the case of the contingent fund of this House. A great many of the expenditures which are made from our contingent fund are expenditures previously authorized by law. But the committee authorized to do so report in an appropriation bill under that clause that this is one of the contingencies for carrying on this department of the Government. And so in a great many similar cases. Now the committee, instead of striking out that sentence and substituting what they propose, ought to add either what they propose or what my colleague [Mr. BANKS] proposes, but to leave that clause as it stands in the rule, so that Congress may not be at the mercy of a single committee in providing for the contingent fund of the House or for the large number of contingencies for carrying on the Departments of the Government not provided for by existing law——

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from New York who has charge of this resolution before he replies allow me to call his attention to the effect of the language of the amendment? The proposition leaves Rule 120, with the exception of the clause in regard to the "contingencies," as it is, and then adds the words:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditure.

Now, the danger that I see in that is that it goes beyond the whole question of amounts appropriated and covers all laws upon which expenditures may be incurred. For example, the Committee on Ways and Means have under consideration a number of custom-houses and offices to be abolished. Under this provision the Committee on Appropriations may take from the Committee on Ways and Means the whole of that subject, because they may so change the law that authorizes the various parts of the customs service as to abolish the law upon which the expenditures are to be incurred.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee have nothing but a recommendatory power.

Mr. KASSON. At the same time they have authority to bring their propositions before the House if this rule is adopted. And in the Committee of the Whole the matter may be hastily acted upon after a chance debate, without being thoroughly examined or considered by the proper committee and without the aid of the recommendations of the Committee on Ways and Means. So in respect to the Committee on the Public Lands. It may be a question of abolishing a certain land office; but the Committee on Appropriations may not only refuse appropriations for that land office, but may abolish the law which authorizes the existence of that and several other offices. And so with the Committee on Commerce. In recommending the diminution of certain appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors they may repeal all the laws that have emanated from that committee.

The objection we take to this proposition is, that it deprives the House of the benefit of the deliberations of the committees that have specific portions of our jurisdiction committed to them, and practically gives to one committee the whole of that jurisdiction.

I desire to say one word more. The action of the House heretofore has been in the reverse direction. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will recollect that when he and I were here first the Committee on Ways and Means had charge of appropriations, of coinage, weights and measures, of the Pacific Railroad, and of banking and currency. All were committed to the charge of that one committee. The House desired to put more committees at work to protect itself against the great power of one committee, and consequently five committees now exist where one existed formerly.

You are now proposing to go back upon that plan and to take away incidentally, as the effect of this proposition, that careful consideration of particular committees and enable one committee to bring the whole subject before the House without the aid and advice of these other committees.

Now, sir, if the gentleman sees that there is force in these considerations, I hope there will be no objection at least that the Committee on Rules shall consider once more the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] and the propositions of other gentlemen, so that the rule shall be so modified that the House shall not be deprived of the benefit of careful consideration by separate committees of measures which now belong to them.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa presents the difficulty that this amendment gives too much power to the Committee on Appropriations. I submit that it only relates to appropriations that entirely pertain to the duties of that committee. I would say in addition that this proposition in no manner cuts off amendments or debates as allowed in Committee of the Whole, so that the objection presented by the gentleman from Iowa cannot exist. Any amendment that is proper in Committee of the Whole must have full and deliberate consideration and discussion.

Mr. KASSON. But my objection is that the proper committee will have no chance to consider the change of law.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, I want to be entirely frank about this matter, and I want to say this: that anything that the Committee on Appropriations do in connection with retrenchment is only in the nature of a recommendation. We must have the judgment upon it of a majority of the House. The majority of the House are alone responsible for the expenditures of money, but if we of the majority present a case requiring a reduction, it requires a vote of more than two-thirds of the House, and unless the other side authorize it it is never in our power to retrench.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say right there that it is in the power of the other committees to present the questions, by a report from their proper committee, for retrenchment by change of law.

Mr. RANDALL. We can only procure the necessary two-thirds once a week—that is on Monday. The present rule places it in the power of any single member to prevent the majority of the House from carrying out retrenchment.

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman does not understand my point; it is that your regular committees can now present those subjects for the consideration of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. There is to-day a point of order pending against the Military Academy bill, which would prevent our reducing in the least degree the expenditures of that institution. We think we may be able to reduce the expenditures of that military establishment from $380,000 down to $231,000 a year. Yet under the rules, as they now stand, we have not the power to report a provision for that purpose, because any one gentleman in this House can raise against it the point of order that it will change existing law.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. COX. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes, and then

I will call the previous question. I hold the floor now by the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] who desires to call up the centennial appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I will be very brief. The majority of the Committee on Rules have reported this very important change of the rules, and of course the majority upon the other side can adopt it and embody it in the rules of this House. But if that is done I hope that hereafter nobody will be found finding fault with the tremendous and stupendous additional power that will thereby be poured into the already full lap of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. It is merely giving that committee power to reduce expenditures; further than that the additional power the gentleman ascribes to it is imaginary.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has said that all that his committee can now do is to bring in or recommend to the House provisions of law, and the House can out vote them. That is true of every other committee. Does not the gentleman see that when he intrusts all this immense power to the Committee on Appropriations he gives to that committee practically the only power of previous examination and dissection, and that when that committee submits its reports to the House it will be the only committee that comes with the authority of having examined and dissected the different subject-matters embraced in its bills? And that committee has a right, which no other committee has, to report at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will modify that statement: it has the power to report at any time only appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. Certainly; I was going to state that. With four years experience on the Committee on Appropriations I believe that if you give to that committee the power that is here sought to be given, the power to change existing laws in their general appropriation bills, which they have the right to report at any time, the whole framework of the Government may be revolutionized by that committee so far as its reports may go, there is nothing it may not do. The restraining power on the Committee on Appropriations at the present time is that it cannot change existing law. Now the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who introduced this resolution, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who reports it back from the Committee on Rules, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL,] who sustains it, are all actually and honestly in favor of retrenchment. I have no doubt about that. I give them the credit for it. But if they adopt this rule they will run into what is a more enormous evil. My experience has been that the most dangerous legislation that ever goes out of the halls of Congress is in appropriation bills. And I will not vote for anything that in any way, under whatever guise it may be urged, or however honestly it may be urged, will increase the power to legislate upon appropriation bills. Now if it be said that I seek to obstruct retrenchment——

Mr. RANDALL. The committee now possess the power to increase salaries and expenditures, and this is to enable them to have the power to diminish or reduce them.

Mr. HALE. Everybody sees that the power to increase should be taken from the committee; and I agree to that. If I am told that I would block retrenchment by opposing this rule, the answer to that is that every branch of the public service is now intrusted to a competent committee. The war branch of the service is intrusted to a competent committee, which may report a bill for reduction, and that bill may be debated and considered, not in Committee of the Whole where there is no record, but in the House, where there is a record. There is an additional evil that occurs to my mind. All this legislation, which is so dangerous, is ingrafted upon appropriation bills in Committee of the Whole, where there is no record. The Committee on Naval Affairs is an able and competent committee. It can at any time, when it is called for reports, bring in a bill abolishing the Marine Corps, and that bill may be discussed at length in the open House, where there is a record. So can the Indian Committee, and the Printing Committee. The Committee on Ways and Means has its special jurisdiction. The committee of my friend who reports this rule, [Mr. COX,] that of Banking and Currency, has its jurisdiction. All that they report can be considered openly, publicly with the yeas and nays on the record. But while this proposed amendment of the rule comes as a retrenchment measure, it involves an enormous evil. If gentlemen pass it, I ask that hereafter there shall be no fault found with the tremendous power thus given to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire a single moment.

Mr. COX. I will yield a minute, and then I will call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] is alarmed at the tremendous power which this new rule, as proposed, will give to the Committee on Appropriations. Now, does not the gentleman know that under the rule as it now stands, and as it has been interpreted for years, the Committee on Appropriations have just exactly the same tremendous power, but a power in another direction, a power to increase the expenditures and not the power to reduce them?

Mr. HALE. Only to increase salaries. The gentleman will bear in mind that the committee has power now to reduce expenditures in other respects.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. My friend is alarmed at the thought that this tremendous power of reduction should be vested in the Committee on Appropriations. But I do not think my friend has raised the point against the present rule, that it confers upon the committee the tremendous and dangerous power to increase the expenditures of the Government by increasing salaries without limit. The gentleman has never made such a point.

Mr. HALE. I have always believed that that decision ought to be changed. I believe now that there ought to be no power either to increase or decrease salaries by a change of existing laws upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret that my friend from Maine has never heretofore brought his views on this subject to the attention of the House.

Now, it is very clear that this vast increase of expenditure during the last twelve years has been effected by means of appropriation bills under the operation of the rules of the House. It is proposed now to go backward along the same road that we have traveled and by means of a modification of the rules retrench the expenditures of the Government. We must do it; and no man can be more conscious of that than my friend from Maine.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. With no wish to be discourteous to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] I must insist upon the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Rules,

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask that the rule as it will read with the proposed amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 102, not voting 32; as follows:

So the report of the Committee on Rules was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the centennial appropriation bill.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion, there were—ayes 123, noes 16—no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. DURHAM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 139, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOOD, of New York, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The first business in order is the Military Academy appropriation bill, which is the special order.

Mr. RANDALL. I move for the present that be laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next business in order is a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American independence.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of American independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufacture, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876," approved March 3, 1875, provision was made for the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Americna Independence by "an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures," to be "held under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876; and whereas by the act of Congress entitled "An act relative to the centennial international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876," approved June 1, 1872, the centennial board of finance was incorporated, with authority to raise the capital necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the said act of March 3, 1871; and whereas the President of the United States, in compliance with a joint resolution of Congress approved June 5, 1874, did "extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and as the governments so invited, to the number of thirty-eight, have so accepted such invitation, and many of them are making extensive preparations to embrace the courtesy so extended to them, thereby rendering proper arrangements for the coming ceremonies on the part of the Government of the United States a matter of honor and good faith; and whereas the preparations designed by the United States centennial commission, and in part executed by the centennial board of finance, are in accordance with the spirit of the acts of Congress relating thereto, and are on a scale creditable to the Government and people of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $1,500,000, to complete the centennial buildings and other preparations, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which shall be paid on the drafts of the president and treasurer of the centennial board of finance, one-third immediately after the passage of this act, and the remainder in four equal monthly payments: Provided, That in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance after the payment of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of Congress, approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said centennial board of finance, the appropriation hereinbefore made shall share equally with the holders of the said centennial stock, and a like percentage thereon be paid into the United States Treasury as may be paid to the holders of the said stock: Provided, also, That the Government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States centennial commission or the centennial board of finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is, I believe, customary for a gentleman reporting a bill to open the discussion; but inasmuch as I do not feel well to-day I propose to postpone any remarks I may have to make on this bill till to-morrow, and now yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HARDENBERGH.]

THE RELATIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT TO THE CENTENNIAL.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Chairman, it would be strange if in the discussion which this bill may evoke the voice of New Jersey found no expression in this audience chamber of the nation.

Earliest of those by whom was conceived the idea of giving to our centennial year a grandeur and a dignity beyond a mere local or State celebration, she has by the voice of her executives, by the solemn sanction of her senate and General Assembly, and by the approval of her people laid her gift of $110,000 upon the common altar as the tribute of her patriotism and her love. Should occasion require she will do more than this. To-day her one hundredth legislative council sits to frame anew for her entrance upon her second centennial her code of laws in accordance with the new constitution accepted during the year past by her people. Upon her soil are the plains of Trenton, of Princeton, and of Monmouth, around whose sacred memories the historian loves to linger as he recounts the story of the revolutionary era. Enshrined within the memories of her people, no less than of the Union, are many of her children, who in all the diversified professions and pursuits of life upon the land and upon the sea have worn the victor's wreath with no doubtful title to respect and confidence.

I feel it a distinguished honor in the discharge of my duty, though with unskilled language, yet firm in my convictions of right and faithful as I desire to be to those by whose consent I am this day their Representative, when I speak for New Jersey I speak for my country, not war-worn, weary, broken, and distracted, but as again bound together by the mystic ties of a common brotherhood, moving forward in the procession of States distinct as the billows but one as the sea, with no purpose but the common advancement and animated by no wish but the security of those blessings which are inseparable from our Union. She bids you to believe, representatives of America, that to insure success the Centennial must be a national endeavor. Foreign governments will not commit themselves to its support unless encouraged by active demonstration on the part of our own. Individual effort will be greatly promoted by the action of this Government, because such action will concentrate the patriotic impulses of the citizens.

The Centennial is in spirit a national celebration. As the Government is representative in all its branches, this idea must also be represented as a unit to give it dignity and effect. An appropriation by the Government will embody the national idea.

The money appropriated will enlarge the area upon which the nation is to be exhibited to the world. What is the Centennial but an exhibition to mankind of the development in manufactures and art of the principles of self-government? It is the Constitution working through the people into the manifold forms of utility and beauty which will be then presented.

Logically the Centennial would be a failure unless the Government was acting in and through it, because it is the system of government which is here to be manifested in its fruits and results. Inventors, manufacturers, sculptors, poets, painters, artists, all who contribute have a right to expect their own Government first to recognize their merit and share in the glory of their achievements; afterward the appeal may be made to the world. It is to be a family reunion, where each child is to exhibit what he has accomplished, and who will take pride in the result if the mother who directed the education of each shall withhold herself from participation in the occasion and decline to approve their conduct? If it be true that foreign nations have refused to co-operate without the sanction of our Government, then the participation of the Government must be on a scale commensurate with its dignity and such as will insure success. The United States must be no party to a celebration which may be considered a failure. It is believed the history of the world can furnish no such example of progress in all that relates to human welfare during the space of one hundred years as our own. The application of steam and electricity to practical purposes has been a great factor in our prosperity. Should not the Government recognize this fact?

One object to be gained by the Centennial is to revive the patriotic feeling which existed during the Revolution. It was there this Government was born. It should cherish these principles by a liberal expression toward the people.

The great republic of antiquity, at the close of the Trojan war, in order to heal the wounds occasioned by it and in obedience to the Delphic oracle, established upon the plains of Olympia those games adapted to the lively and flexible character of the Greeks which became a permanent national institution and attracted the admiration of surrounding nations. All thoughts of hostility were immediately laid aside in the general preparation for the splendid festival. The Olympic games were frequented by an assemblage of the nations, and to be a conqueror there inflamed the ambition of mankind more than the honors of war or government. Chronology was reckoned from the first Olympiad. May not the Centennial have its origin in the same principle? Let it be to us the close of all hostilities—the healing of all the wounds of war, the gathering of the nations in friendly competition, not in athletic or muscular exhibitions but in the higher and nobler display of intellect and genius—the triumphs of art, in painting and poetry, in music and sculpture, in mechanical inventions, and all the thousand forms in which it will be visible.

Encouraged and sustained by the Government, I believe it will announce an era of prosperity; it will give confidence to our people; it will revive the stroke of busy industry; it will spread to the winds of every sea the long-folded sails of commerce. Nations are moving in vast procession to lay their offerings of peace upon the altars of our progress. Sheathed be the sword forever. Let them be greeted as a nation of freemen alone can greet them. Fidelity to our Union is assured by the North and the South, the East and the West. The pageant will indeed be strange. One hundred years have rolled away and we have attained the highest rank of empire within this year. The peaceful navies of the world will ride at anchor in our harbors freighted with the contributions of the ancient masters, and the wonderful treasures of the Orient be poured into our lap. Princes of royal blood, as they came before, will come again and on bended knee at Mount Vernon's sacred shades render homage to the virtues and the memory of Washington.

> Such graves as his are pilgrim-shrines,
> Shrines to no code or creed confined—
> The Delphian vales, the Palestines,
> The Meccas of the mind.

Such is the genius of our Government, and such the glory of our institutions. Let no one seek to mar its destiny or arrest its progress. We shall be true to ourselves. The coming years, in the providence of God, will bind us yet stronger by the ties of concord and affection; but should perils from without, from whatever cause, arise to threaten our weal, then from the summit of that monument, now rearing here to attest the virtues of the Father of his Country, shall wave a flag which may bid defiance to a world in arms. I ask for New Jersey that this bill may pass.

Mr. HOPKINS. As it is late in the afternoon, I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN SPAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Mr. WADDELL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to include in his resolution a call for correspondence with any other government than that of Spain, because there has been correspondence with other governments.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman accept the modification of his resolution?

Mr. MORRISON. I do not. The gentleman will excuse me, but those who want the correspondence with other governments can introduce a separate resolution to that end.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Richardson, acting Secretary of the Treasury, in behalf of the United States, and John F. Miller, in behalf of said company, was made and executed in pursuance of law, and whether said lease was made to the best advantage of the United States according to the offers of other bidders; and also whether the interests of the United States were properly protected by the stipulations of said lease; and whether the Alaska Commercial Company have complied with its terms and conditions, and with the provisions, requirements and limitations of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1870; with power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to report at any time.

2. Whether, since the end of the rebellion, any officer of the Army has accepted or held any office in the diplomatic or consular service of the Government, or has been ordered, or detailed, or received leave of absence to carry on any negotiation or arrangement in behalf of the United States with any foreign government or people; and, if so, the name of such officer, by whom ordered, or detailed, or granted leave, together with copies of such order, or detail, or leave.

3. Whether, since the end of the rebellion, any officer of the Army on the active list has, contrary to the statutes of the United States, been detailed for the performance of duties of a civil nature which interfered with the performance of his military duties proper; and, if so, the name of such officer.

4. Whether any officer of the Army, since the close of the rebellion, has been appointed, or detailed, or assigned to duty as clerk or secretary of the President, or to any civil duties in or about executive office in Washington; and, if so, the name of such officer, the character of his duties, the period of service therein, by whom appointed, detailed, or assigned, together with copies of all such orders and the section of the statutes of the United States authorizing or permitting such service.

5. What additional legislation, if any, is needed to confine officers of the Army on the active list to the performance of military duties proper, and to prevent their interference, by assignment or otherwise, in the performance of civil functions.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. By leave of my colleague I move to amend by substituting the word "revolution" for "rebellion."

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I decline to accept any amendment.

The resolution was adopted.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 18, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 13, 1875, statements showing the names of Indian agents who have complied with the law requiring them to keep an itemized account of all receipts and expenditures, together with a record of all contracts; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, statements showing the balance due on the assets of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company at the time of their transfer, the action taken to collect the same, and their present status; also, the receipts and expenditures from July 13, 1874, to December 31, 1875; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. THURMAN. I present the credentials of James B. Eustis, claiming a seat in the Senate as Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana, and ask their reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be so referred, if there be no objection.

Mr. THURMAN. I suppose they ought to be read; it is customary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the papers presented by Mr. THURMAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves the reference of these papers to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, is the reading completed?

Mr. THURMAN. As the documents are somewhat voluminous, they may be considered as read without actually being read.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know, if they are not to be read, who certifies those papers beyond the certificate which the Secretary has already read?

Mr. THURMAN. They are certified by the proper officers of the General Assembly; that is to say, by the speaker and clerk of the house of representatives and by the senator who presided at the joint meeting, and their signatures are attested by the certificate of the secretary of state and the seal of the State. This is the usual verification of legislative proceedings. They are a transcript from the journal.

Mr. CONKLING. These papers are not presented as transcripts of legislative proceedings; they are presented as the credentials of one claiming a seat in the Senate. An act of Congress has described what credentials must be, as I understand. Among other things, they must be certified by the governor of the State; and it is such credentials, and only such, that the Senate knows.

Mr. HOWE. Are not these certified by the governor?

Mr. CONKLING. My friend on my right inquires whether these are certified by the governor. It was that inquiry that I made of the Chair, and the Senator from Ohio answers that they are not. Therefore, I submit that prima facie they are not credentials.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands, and he will state to the Senator from Ohio that they are not certified to by the governor.

Mr. CONKLING. I was therefore about to suggest that, not being credentials, they ought not to be received as credentials. The Senate ought not to advance at all in regard to them until it knows more than it can know, if the papers are not to be read. We have heard them in part, and there yet seems to be a large roll of unread papers at the desk of the Secretary. I began, however, this suggestion in the absence of the chairman of the committee to which the Senator from Ohio proposes to refer these papers, and as the matter pertains to him rather than to me I rose rather to save the Senate a false position, if we should get into a false position by receiving as credentials papers which appear not to be credentials, than for any other purpose. Now that the Senator from Indiana is here, I call his attention as chairman of the committee, suggesting to him, as to the Senate, that these papers ought not to be received until they have been read or some opportunity given to Senators to know whether they are in any sense credentials.

Mr. MORTON. I was not in the Senate when these papers, purporting to be credentials, were presented, and I will ask to have the matter passed over till to-morrow morning, so that I may have an opportunity to examine them. Let them lie on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no particular objection to that, but I wish to say, in reply to the observations of the Senator from New York, that I do not suppose he, upon reflection, would state as his opinion that, if the governor of a State refuses to give the certificate which the law requires him to give, the elected Senator loses his place.

Mr. CONKLING. That would be another question.

Mr. THURMAN. It would be a question, I think, so easily answered that I should anticipate a unanimous vote in the Senate upon such a question as that. There is no mode provided by law to coerce the governor of a State to give a certificate. He may withhold it ever so wrongly; he may withhold it under a mistaken idea of his duty. There is no sanction in the law which puts the mandate upon him to give that certificate, none whatsoever; and certainly the requisition of our statutes cannot be considered as constituting the certificate of the governor the only evidence of the election of a Senator by a State Legislature.

Besides, the practice of the Senate has been in accordance with what I suggest. The credentials of Mr. MCMILLEN, when presented, were referred to the committee; and they consisted of a transcript of the proceedings of the Louisiana Legislature. There was another case: the case of Mr. Sykes, of Alabama, where his credentials consisted of a transcript of the proceedings of the Legislature of that State, where there was no governor's certificate whatsoever, because the governor refused to grant him a certificate. In each of those cases the Senate received them as the title-papers of the party, evidencing whatever right he had to a seat in this body, and it never was imagined that he could lose his right because the governor of the State saw fit to refuse a certificate. That is the state of the practice in the Senate. In both those cases the so-called credentials—and I think they were properly called credentials; I do not care, though, what you call them; by any other name they will do as well——

Mr. CONKLING.—

That which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not say anything about odors. By any other name they are quite as effective. They manifest the title of the party whatever you call them, if he has a title. I propose not to have the Senator-elect sworn in upon them, but to refer them to the committee. If I had asked that the Senator-elect should be sworn in on these papers, then the objections of the Senator from New York would be well taken, perhaps; but it is not well taken when I offer them as evidence of the title of this gentleman to a seat in this body and ask that they go to the proper committee for investigation.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I can agree to very much that the Senator from Ohio has said, although I am not able to see the distinction he makes between a case of presenting certain papers as credentials to be referred to the appropriate committee, and presenting them as evidence on which the claimant may be sworn in if no objection is made. With the exception of that distinction, very likely I might agree to what the Senator has said. He has answered an objection which I did not make. I did not intend to imply that if there were no governor in the State, or if the governor should refuse to certify, no substituted evidence might answer the purpose. That is not this case. Here come papers with no allegation that the governor has refused to give the ordinary certificate, but they are papers which prima facie are not those which alone are described in the statute as the papers upon which we are to rely in such an instance.

Therefore I say that prima facie they are not credentials as credentials are described in the statute. When a case comes here showing that a governor has refused to certify, we will pass upon that case. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." It is enough for me now to know, without going beyond these papers, although we do know something more about the case, that a proceeding alleged on one side to be wholly irregular and culminating in a package of papers irregular—I speak now according to the statute—comes before us. I do not know but that it may be right to receive and refer these papers. For one, before I vote for that motion I want an opportunity to hear the papers read or to read them myself. Therefore I concur in the request that they may lie over a day until some member of the Senate may know exactly what they contain.

Mr. THURMAN. One word more. The papers were being read when the Senator addressed the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not interrupt the reading, I beg my friend's pardon; he interrupted it himself by saying they were too voluminous to be read.

Mr. THURMAN. They were being read at that time.

I wish to say one word, though, in regard to the remark of the Senator from New York as to the irregularity of this proceeding. There is no irregularity at all, unless the absence of the usual certificate of the governor constitutes an irregularity, and that certainly does not. The absence of that certificate certainly requires that other proof of the title of the party to a seat here shall be produced. That is all the absence of that evidence requires. In answer to the suggestion upon the subject of irregularity, it will be found on examining these papers—I have read them carefully—that the act of Congress has been strictly complied with in the election of Mr. Eustis to the Senate in the fullest manner in which it could be complied with.

Mr. CONKLING. May I make an inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Do the papers show that the two houses, thereby meaning a quorum of the two houses, met in joint convention for this election?

Mr. THURMAN. I will tell the Senator what they show. They show exactly that case which induced the passage of our act in relation to the election of Senators.

Mr. CONKLING. Do they show the case I have put?

Mr. THURMAN. I will tell you in a moment what they do show. The reason for the passage of that act was that twice in the history of this country, once in my own State and I believe the other case was in the State of Indiana, one of the houses of the Legislature, the two houses being of different politics, had refused to go into an election; and it was to prevent any house from defeating an election of a Senator of the United States that that act was passed; and hence its provisions are that on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the Legislature, or in case of a vacancy on a day specified in the act, each house shall ballot for Senator, and that on the next day they shall meet and compare their journals, and if it appear that any individual has received a majority in each branch of the Legislature he shall be declared to be elected Senator; but if no such thing appears, then they shall proceed in joint assembly to vote, and it only requires that in that joint assembly there shall be a majority of all the members elected to the Legislature, of both houses considered as an aggregate body. It was for the very express purpose of preventing a majority of one branch defeating an election that the authority was conferred on that joint assembly to proceed to the election of a Senator, although a majority of one of the branches might be absent. It is sufficient to constitute a constituent body to elect a Senator that there is there present and voting a majority of the aggregate number of the two houses of the Assembly.

In this case these papers do show, not only that there were present a majority of the aggregate number of the two houses, but they also show that a majority actually did vote in the election; that there were more who actually cast their votes for the different candidates (for there were three candidates voted for) than constituted a majority of the whole number of the General Assembly of the State; so that it is precisely the case provided for in the statute, and for which the statute was passed There is no irregularity, therefore, in that.

The whole question turns, and it will be found to turn—I say it now—not upon a technicality at all, but upon a substantial point. It all turns upon the question whether there was a vacancy. If the Senate shall decide that Mr. Pinchback is entitled to a seat on this floor, that is an end. Then there was no vacancy. If it decides that he is not entitled to a seat on this floor, then there was a vacancy, and this election is perfectly regular. That is the whole of the case.

I have no objection to its lying over, if the gentleman desires that, although the usual course has been to refer such papers; but certainly, in respect to the governor's refusing to give a certificate, if the committee or the Senate desires any proof on that point, it can be produced.

Mr. CONKLING. I asked the Senator from Ohio whether it was true that a quorum of each house participated in the proceedings; and I wish, first of all, to make my acknowledgments to the Senator for the very frank and explicit answer which he gave to that question. We all know, after hearing him, whether a quorum of each house did participate in this proceeding or not.

Now, with the statute in my hand, I venture to dissent from the statement of the meaning of it made by the Senator from Ohio. He says it was passed, among other things, to provide for the very case he states, to wit, the case of one house not proceeding to the election of a Senator. That I deny; and I put to him, as such a case which the statute was not intended to provide for, the instance in which one house denies that there is any vacancy, denies that it is competent to proceed to the election of a Senator; as, for example, if tomorrow in the State of Ohio it should be moved in one or other of the houses of its Legislature to proceed to the election of a Senator in place of my honored friend from Ohio, even though the other house should persist in objecting to it, and though they might assemble in joint convention a majority of the members of the two houses, I deny that the case would have arisen which this statute was intended to touch.

I do not say that that is the case before us, but I do say that it is an answer to the sweeping observation of the Senator from Ohio that this statute is intended to cover all cases whatsoever (for that is what he means,) where one House refused upon a motion being made to go into the election of a Senator. If there be a vacancy in the office, if it be the duty of the two Houses to proceed to elect a Senator and one House refuses, it is quite likely that the case has arisen which the honorable Senator from Ohio adverts to.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator puts a hypothetical case. He supposes that one branch of the Legislature of Ohio should propose to elect somebody else in my place, which would be a very unwise thing in that Legislature. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. It would be a monstrous thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. And the other branch says "There is no vacancy, and therefore we will not go into an election;" and he asks if that does not prove that that statute does not apply to a case like this. It proves nothing of the sort. If both branches of the Legislature of Ohio were to assemble—they being now in session—and elect two Senators in the place of my colleague and myself, although every member concurred in the election and concurred in it upon the idea that there were vacancies in the Senate, the whole proceeding would be void, absolutely void, because there is no vacancy; and therefore the question whether there is a vacancy or not is a question that lies at the foundation of the whole thing. The proceeding is regular enough if there is a vacancy. If there is no vacancy, then the proceeding goes for nothing, although every member of both houses has concurred in it.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio is unusually fond this morning of answering objections which nobody has made. I did not say at all "does not such a case as I supposed in Ohio prove that the statute does not apply to this case." I made no such suggestion. I have refrained from making any observation upon the merits of this case. The statute may apply to this case; it may not, for aught I have said, or indeed for aught I know, in any sense which would enable me to vote or to act on what I know. I was only, at the moment answering the broad declaration of the Senator from Ohio that whenever one House refuses to go into an election of Senator the case had arisen which this statute provides for, and which enables both houses by a majority in joint convention to act.

I do not say—I repeat that again—that the statute does not apply to this case. I do not say that it was not the duty of both these houses to elect. I do not know whether it was or not. That is a question that I want to ascertain hereafter. I do not conclude myself upon that at all. If I have an impression upon it, it is founded upon information too vague to be appropriate as the basis of any vote I may be called upon to give. I am merely testing the broad phraseology of the Senator in which he describes and interprets this statute, and I say it is much too broad. Now whether it was the duty of one house in Louisiana to proceed to elect, which house refused to do so, is a question which we are going to ascertain, I take it. I do not anticipate that question at all; I express no opinion upon it. I only say that these papers are irregular, and that if it be true, as the Senator implies, although he does not admit, that one of these two houses as a house did not participate but refused to participate in this election, that is a second irregularity which may be cured by evidence dehors the papers here or evidence within the papers if it turns out that being the duty of both houses to proceed, one refused to proceed. That may be; but I say on the face of the papers they themselves are irregular, and if the truth be that a quorum of one house did not participate, that on its face is irregular; and if it is to be answered at all it must be answered by evidence and by that which will bring the case, as the Senator insists the case is, within the statute. Let us see. If it is, I take it we shall all vote according to the statute. If it is not until they do elect another Senator in place of my friend, I shall count on two votes from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it seems that my friend from New York this morning has expended all his force simply for the purpose of convicting me of making too broad a statement in respect to the statute.

Mr. CONKLING. That would be an event so extraordinary that if I could establish that, it would be well.

Mr. THURMAN. It would be, undoubtedly; but I must even take that little consolation from my friend. He is too good a lawyer not to know that a lawyer, or even a judge, and I hope the Senator, when he uses language, uses it, as the lawyers say, secundum subjectam materiam, according to the subject, to be limited to the case which is in hand. When I say that this is a case exactly within the statutes, I of course speak of an election when there is a vacancy or when there is some one to be elected in anticipation of a vacancy. I was using language that is restrained by the subject-matter. That is all; and I submit to my friend that, although I am perfectly willing to be convicted of using too broad a statement, if I did so, in this case I spoke judicially.

Mr. BAYARD. I would inquire whether the reading of the papers was interrupted or whether the entire proceedings have been read to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not been read wholly; only a portion of them.

Mr. BAYARD. Was the reading concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers have not been entirely read.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I would ask that the reading be continued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was raised to the reading, but the Chair did not submit the question to the Senate. If the objection is persisted in, the Chair will now submit the question to the Senate, under the rule.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the papers be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to submit to the Senate that my colleague suggested that, as the papers were very voluminous, they be considered as read without being read in full, and therefore perhaps they had better be printed in the RECORD, and let us go on with the morning business.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to these papers being printed in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the motion to refer lie over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the reference has not been made. The Senator from New York objected to the reference. The order is that the papers be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONKLING. And that the matter lie over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so understood.

The papers are as follows:

SENATE CHAMBER, STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Secretary's Office, New Orleans, January 15, 1876.

Extract from the official journal of the senate of the State of Louisiana for the session held on Tuesday, January 11, 1876.

By Mr. White:

The constitutional rules being suspended by a four-fifths affirmative vote of the senate, the bill was placed on its second reading, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Senator Blackburn offered the following motion and moved its adoption:

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATOR.

Mr. Kidd moved that the house do now proceed to the election of a United States Senator.

Mr. Lowell asked, and obtained, leave to present the following protest; which was read and ordered to be spread upon the minutes:

"We, the undersigned, members of the house of representatives of the State of Louisiana, entertaining the belief that there is no vacancy in the United States Senate from this State; the General Assembly elected in 1872, on the second Tuesday after the organization of its first regular session, to wit, January 3, 1873, according to the forms of law, having elected Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback United States Senator for the term ending March 4, 1879, cannot consistently participate in an attempt to elect a United States Senator; we therefore submit this our formal protest against this proposed action.

"William Murrel, of Madison; J. S. Wilson, of East Baton Rouge; W. F. Keyes, of Terrebonne; L. W. Baker, of Bossier; J. E. Parker, of Jefferson; T. M. Grant, of Morehouse; Cain Sartain, of Carroll; J. B. Jourdain, seventh representative district; E. A. Hubeau, of Jefferson; Isaac Sutton, of Saint Mary; P. Jones Yorke, of Carroll; Milton Jones, of Pointe Coupee; G. W. Hill, of Ascension; Louis Butler, of Ascension; James S. Matthews, of Tensas; Charles W. Lowell, of Jefferson; J. M. Carville, of Iberville; H. Raby, of Natchitoches; J. Ross Stewart, of Tensas; A. J. Cousin, of Tammany; S. R. Piles, of Saint Mary; W. G. Lane, of East Baton Rouge; Robert Guichard, of Saint Bernard; E. W. Dewees, of Red River; N. E. Milon, of Plaquemines; T. J. Johnson, of Caddo; E. D. Triplett, of East Baton Rouge; James W. Armstead, of West Feliciana; J. W. Woods, of Ouachita; D. C. Hill, of Ouachita; George Gracien, of Orleans; V. Dickenson, of Saint James; J. S. Davidson, of Iberville; L. A. Snaer, of Iberia; L. Souer, of Avoyelles; T. H. Woods, of West Baton Rouge; Charles W. Keating, of Caddo; Emelia Honoré, of Pointe Coupee; A. B. Levissee, of Caddo; William Ridgely, of Concordia; R. R. Ray, of East Feliciana; Henry Demas, of Saint John the Baptist; Oscar F. Hunsaker, of Saint James."

Mr. Walker moved the following as an amendment to Mr. Kidd's motion, to wit:

"That it be adopted that whereas the question of election of United States Senator has arisen in this house, that while this house recognizes the fact of an existing vacancy in the office of Senator of the United States for the State of Louisiana, it is the sense of this house of representatives that it is not proper, and at the same time would be unjust to the people of the State of Louisiana, for a Senator now to be chosen by the suffrages of a senate and house not entirely representative of the people, and in part composed in contradiction to the popular will as expressed in the general elections. And further, that this house at present sits and recognizes the present composition as in part de facto and not de jure, and only for the purpose indispensable proceeding for the relief of the State."

Mr. Lowell arose to a point of order, to wit, that under the rules of the house Mr. Walker's motion had to lie over one day.

The chair ruled Mr. Lowell's point of order not well taken, for the following reasons, to wit: The gentleman from Jackson having moved that this house do now proceed to the election of a United States Senator, and the gentleman from Orleans having offered a substitute to the motion of the gentleman from Jackson, the chair rules that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Orleans can be entertained without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. Mathews, of Tensas, inquired from the speaker whether there was any official information received in relation to a vacancy of the United States Senator from this State.

The speaker answered in the negative.

Mr. Lowell arose to a point of order, that inasmuch as Mr. Walker's motion amending Mr. Kidd's motion was sent in writing to the desk and read to the house, it came in the form of an order, and consequently had to lie over under the rules.

The speaker ruled the point of order of Mr. Lowell well taken, for the following reasons: Mr. Lowell, of Jefferson, raised the point of order that the substitute offered by Mr. Walker, of Orleans, being in the nature of an order or resolution, could not be entertained without a suspension of the rules. The chair ruled the point well taken, because it was evident from the document presented by Mr. Walker that it came under rule No. 32, and could not be entertained on the day presented, unless by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

Mr. Kidd moved that the house take a recess until three p. m.

Mr. Lowell moved to adjourn until twelve o'clock m. to-morrow, and on that motion Mr. Wilson called for the yeas and nays; which resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Armstead, Butler, Baker, Carville, Cousin, Davidson, Dewees, Demas, Guichard, Gracien, Hill of Ascension, Hahn, Hubeau, Hill of Ouachita, Honore, Jourdain, Johnson of Caddo, Jones of Pointe Coupeé, Keeting, Keyes, Lane, Lowell, Murrel, Milon, Mathews of Tensas, Parker, Piles, Ridgeley, Raby, Sutton, Snear, Sartain, Souer, Stewart, Thomas, Wilson, Woods of West Baton Rouge, Woods of Ouachita, Yorke—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Aldigé, Booth, Byrne, Bayley, Blaffer, Bower, Beasley, Billieu, Brice, Collins, Carmouche, Carloss, Dupré, DeBlanc, Dugas, Durr, Delhomer, Dunn, Edwards of Tangipahoa, Edwards of Richland, Elliott, Grant, Gilmore, Hammond, Jeffries, Johnson of La Fourche, Jones of Lincoln, Koontz, Kummel, Kelly, Kidd, Luckett, Levisee, Lafargue, Maginnis, Meredith, Mathews of Franklin, Martin, McCullam, McAlpin, Magee, Nunez, Pascal, Pipes, Roman, Richardson, Ray, Smith, Self, Seaman, Sibilski, Schenck, Stafford, Scales, Schuler, Voorhies, Vidrine, Walker, Wiltz, Walters, Wells, Webb, Young—63.

So the house refused to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. Mathews, of Tensas, leave of absence was granted him until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Demas, the house took a recess until 2.30 p. m.

At 2.30 p. m. the house was called to order by Hon. E. D. Estilette, speaker.

On a call of the roll the following members answered to their names, to wit:

Speaker Estilette, and Messrs. Aldigé, Booth, Byrne, Bayley, Blaffer, Bower, Beasley, Billieu, Brice, Collins, Carloss, Dupré, De Blanc, Dugas, Durr, Dunn, Edwards of Tangipahoa, Edwards of Richland, Elliott, Gilmore, Hahn, Hammond, Jeffries, Johnson of La Fourche, Jones of Lincoln, Koontz, Kummel, Kelly, Kidd, Luckett, Lafargue, Maginnis, Meredith, Mitchel, Mathews of Franklin, Martin, McCullam, McAlpine, Magee, Nunez, Pascal, Pipes, Roman, Richardson, Smith, Self, Seaman, Sibilski, Schenck, Stafford, Scales, Schuler, Voorhies, Vidrine, Walker, Wiltz, Walters, Webb, Young—60.

On motion of Mr. Kidd, the house proceeded to the election of a United States Senator, and he nominated Hon. J. B. Eustis, of Orleans.

Mr. Hahn nominated the Hon. J. G. Taliaferro, of Catahoula.

On a call of the roll the following was the result of the vote, namely:

For Hon. J. B. Eustis—Speaker Estilette, and Messrs, Aldigé, Booth, Byrne, Bayley, Blaffer, Bower, Beasley, Billeu, Brice, Collins, Carmouche, Carloss, Dupré, De Blanc, Dugas, Dunn, Durr, Delhommer, Edwards of Tangipahoa, Edwards of Richland, Elliott, Gilmore, Hammond, Jeffries, Johnson of La Fourche, Jones of Lincoln, Koontz, Kummel, Kelly, Kidd, Luckett, Lafargue, Maginnis, Meredith, Mitchell, Matthews of Franklin, Martin, McCullom, McAlpin, Magee, Nunez, Pascal, Pipes, Roman, Richardson, Smith, Self, Seaman, Sibiliski, Schenck, Stafford, Scales, Schuler, Voorhies, Vidrine, Wiltz, Walters, Wells, Webb, Young—61.

For Hon. J. G. Taliaferro—Mr. Hahn—1.

For Hon. H. N. Ogden, of Orleans—Mr. Walker—1.

When Mr. Walker's name was called, and before voting, he asked leave to explain his vote, and while he was proceeding in so doing he was called to order by Mr. Dupré.

The speaker announced that Hon. J. B. Eustis, of New Orleans, having received an absolute majority of the votes of the members of this house, was declared to be the choice of this house for United States Senator.

On motion of Mr. Wiltz, the house adjourned until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

E. D. ESTILETTE.

The house met pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the Hon. E. D. Estilette, speaker, in the chair.

On motion of Mr. Snaer the reading of the journal was dispensed with, and it was adopted.

Mr. Dupré explained that his request, as published in the journal of the 11th, to have his name erased from all standing committees, was ironical, the speaker having appointed on none.

On motion of Mr. Kidd, the clerk of the house was directed to inform the senate of the vote given on yesterday by the house for United States Senator, and that, under the requirement of the law, the house of representatives was ready to receive the senate at twelve o'clock m. on this day to proceed on joint ballot to the election of United States Senator.

The clerk then proceeded to the senate chamber, and, having returned to the house, reported that he had informed the senate of the vote given on yesterday by the house for United States Senator under the requirements of the law, and that the house of representatives was now ready to proceed in joint session to the election of a United States Senator; that no answer had been returned by the senate.

W. JASPER BLACKBURN,

E. D. ESTILETTE.
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
PETER I. TREZEVANT,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE STATE OF LOUISIANA,
New Orleans, January 14, 1876.

I, P. G. Deslonde, secretary of state for the State of Louisaina, do hereby certify that Hon. E. D. Estilette was speaker of the house and P. J. Trezevant clerk of the house of representatives of the State of Louisiana; that Hon. W. J. [SEAL.] P. G. DESLONDE,

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the democratic conservative convention of the State of Louisiana, held at New Orleans, January 6, 1876, concerning the elections and the condition of the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented three petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that aid be extended in the construction of the Texas Pacific Railroad by the United States Government; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition signed by a number of citizens of the State of New York and of the State of Massachusetts. These petitioners are, and those dead whom they represent were stockholders in the Columbian Insurance Company of New York. I venture to state at the length of only a moment the contents of this petition for a reason the pertinency of which will occur to some members of the Senate, I am sure. They state that being stockholders in this company, during the, war of the rebellion very extensive risks were taken; that large payments were made for losses sustained by the depredations of the Shenandoah, the Alabama, and other cruisers; that the sum of these losses paid by the company was $600,000; and that in consequence of the payment of these losses the company failed and all of these petitioners became losers to the amount of their interest in it. They ask such an amendment of the fifteenth section of an act heretofore adopted as will submit to the commission of Alabama claims the question whether this insurance company, among others, is or is not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of those who lost, and whose losses it paid. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented the petition of Elizabeth M. Dittor, praying for a grant of one hundred acres of land for her father's service in the Maryland Line in the revolutionary war, in which he served as corporal from the beginning to the end of the war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also presented a memorial of the constitutional convention of Alabama, asking for an additional section of land in each township in the State for school purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of Elias Rector, of Arkansas, late superintendent of Indian affairs for the southern superintendency, praying that he and his sureties may be released from payment of certain sums of money charged against him on the books of the Treasury Department as such superintendent; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of W. E. Wysham, of Baltimore County, Maryland, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARVEY presented two petitions of citizens of Kansas, praying for the repeal of the two-cent United States stamp-tax on bank-checks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of Alexander W. Hope and 125 other citizens of Alton, Illinois, and the petition of Laird Norton & Co. and other citizens of Winona, Minnesota, asking an appropriation of $100,000 for the improvement of the Upper Mississippi River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Delor Curtis and 107 other citizens of Columbia County, Wisconsin, praying for the speedy completion of the Fox River improvement and the construction of an ample canal along the banks of the Wisconsin River from Portage City, Wisconsin, to the Mississippi River, in accordance with the third plan recommended to the Government by Major-General Warren, of the United States Engineer Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of R. P. Eaton & Co., publishers of the New England Farmer, and others, praying that the postage on third-class matter be reduced to one cent for every two ounces; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BAYARD. I present the petition of Thomas Mackey & Co. and others, praying the repeal of the stamp-tax on bank-checks. I do not know of what State the petitioners are residents. The petition is sent to me by Mr. Heald, of Delaware. I therefore present it and move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Augustus Watson, praying compensation for the use of his self-sealing stamped newspaper-wrappers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I found the bundle which I hold in my hand on my desk this morning, and it has this indorsement: "This bundle came by express this morning. It contains pamphlets in the Spencer case."

I feel some delicacy in presenting it as it is mere newspaper testimony at the best; but as it has been presented to furnish reading matter to the committee probably, I ask that that disposition be made of it, that it be referred to the same committee which now has charge of the Spencer case—the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate receive the papers and refer them to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the papers?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has not stated. They relate to what he terms the Spencer case. Is there objection to their being received and so referred? The Chair hears none.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 244) to establish the collection district of Arkansas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of Robert Johnson, late collector of internal revenue for the third district of Alabama, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the passage of a law authorizing the district attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas to investigate and settle, on legal and equitable terms, under the direction of the Solicitor of the Treasury, the accounts between the United States and the sureties of the late Peter T. Crutchfield, of Little Rock, formerly United States designated depositary, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 146) extending the time for the completion of the Oregon Central Railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon, reported it without amendment.

G. HARRIS HEAP.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 3) authorizing the acceptance by G. Harris Heap, consul of the United States at Tunis, of the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis at the international exhibition of 1876 at Philadelphia, have directed me to report it back with an amendment. As the joint resolution is very short, I ask the Senate to take it up at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes G. Harris Heap, consul of the United States at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis at the international exhibition of 1876 at Philadelphia, and for this purpose it grants him a leave of absence for one year from the 1st of January, 1876.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was to add to the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That during his absence from his post he shall receive no compensation from the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 172) providing for settlement upon the lands known as the Fort Kearney military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 811) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 1051) to provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned or built, to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 1052) to correct an error in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, to the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

The bill (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NORWOOD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 285) for the relief of W. S. McComb, of the State of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 287) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the Alexandria Canal," approved July 27, 1868; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 288) granting the right of way to the Birmingham and Saint Louis Railroad Company through the public domain, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 289) to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States," approved March 3, 1857, to States admitted into the Union since that date; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the bill which has given rise to so much discussion hitherto; which was considered by the Judiciary Committee a year or two ago, and reported upon?

Mr. HARVEY. I cannot identify it by that description.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read at length.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to settle accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States," approved March 3, 1857, be, and they are hereby, extended, with the same restrictions and limitations, to all the States, as fully as if now re-enacted.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay any sum or sums of money found to be due to any of said States; and a sum sufficient for that purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot tell certainly from the reading of this bill whether it involves the same question of law as the bill which I had in mind.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senator will permit me, I can state what it does involve. It is that in the adjustment made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office with the different States as to their percentage on the money derived from the sales of public lands, Indian reservations shall be included, and that the States admitted since the time that Mississippi and other States were so settled with shall have the same allotment. It applies to permanent Indian reservations, extending over a period of twenty years, if I remember the act to which this refers. I have not the act at hand now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I assume then that it does not present the question which was referred to the Judiciary Committee two or three years ago and reported upon as to what the legal rights of certain States are under existing law. If on the report of the Committee on Public Lands or from inquiry it should appear that it does involve that question, then it will be open to us to have it referred to the Law Committee afterward, and so I make no opposition to the Senator's motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 290) to amend section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 291) for the relief of Francisco V. DeCoster; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 292) for the relief of Thomas Belew; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 293) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to cancel and annul the condemnation of ground in square 762, in the city of Washington, for a public alley, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CRAGIN. I ask that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that that bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CRAGIN. It has no reference to public grounds whatever. The square referred to is owned by private individuals. The alley was condemned and never has been built. The majority, and almost the entire number of owners of land in the square ask that it may be annulled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 294) for the relief of Charles E. Hedges; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 295) to amend an act entitled "An act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad and to regulate its construction and operation;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 296) to equalize fees allowed attorneys for collecting pay or bounty; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 297) appropriating money to erect a building at Little Rock, Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, it was

Mr. KERNAN. I was requested to move that Jonas P. Levy have leave to withdraw his papers as to which there was an adverse report. I ask that he have leave to withdraw the papers on leaving copies. They are voluminous papers I am told.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The order will be made.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate (if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests) copies of any correspondence had under his authority with any other government or its representatives on the subject of the centennial celebration to be held at Philadelphia in the year 1876.

RESTORATION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DORSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is requested to make inquiry, and report whether the restoration of the franking privilege would increase the cost of mail service, and, if so, to what extent, and whether it is expedient to restore the same.

WITNESSES BEFORE MILITARY COURTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move that we proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 202. It is a little matter which I think it is important should be acted upon, and I think there will be no objection now.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be recollected that when we adjourned on Thursday last the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] had the floor, and yesterday morning he gave notice that to-day he would have a communication from the Treasury Department which he wished to lay before the Senate. Now, as I understand the resolution offered by myself last week requiring the appointment of a committee is the business regularly in order, I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not interfere with the regular order.

Mr. CRAGIN. I ask unanimous consent to take up this bill if it is necessary. It is quite an important bill, but it will take only a few minutes. I am sure that the Senator will not object if he listens to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will observe to the Senator from West Virginia that the morning hour having expired the Senator from New Hampshire asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which he has named. If objection is made, the morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business of yesterday comes up, which is the resolution relative to the joint rules.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire; but I understood yesterday that by unanimous consent the resolution offered by myself, looking to the appointment of a committee, was laid over until this morning at the request of the senior Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that that was the general understanding; but pending that, during the session of the Senate yesterday, another question was taken up and the Senate adjourned while that was pending, leaving it the unfinished business. The rule is that the unfinished business takes precedence.

Mr. DAVIS. While I do not so understand, yet I give notice now that after the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire is acted upon I shall ask the Senate to take up the resolution offered by me.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it wise and much for the best to consider and to determine one question at a time, and not alternate questions. I think we shall dispose of very much more business by pursuing that course; and, inasmuch as the resolution relative to the joint rules is now before the Senate and is in order, if the Senator from Massachusetes, who I believe is entitled to the floor to-day on another matter, does not desire to go on, I hope the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the question before it regularly. If, however, the Senator from Massachusetts desires to go on I shall feel it my duty to yield, but from no other consideration.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I think that, under the circumstances, and especially in view of the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, the subject of his resolution might as well be disposed of at once as to have the consideration of it delayed longer. As far as I am concerned personally, I have no preference in the matter: but, as the Senator from West Virginia seems to desire that the subject should be disposed of, I am entirely content that it should be, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I shall defer to the wishes of the Senator from Massachusetts, as he is entitled to the floor; but I understood him yesterday to state that he wished to go on this morning.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no feeling about it. I am prepared to go on; but if it would be more consistent with the public business that some other matter should be taken up, I am content with that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hamsphire asks for the present consideration of the bill which he has named. Is there objection to its consideration? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subject to call.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 202) to secure the attendance and payment of witnesses before military courts.

Mr. CRAGIN. I propose to amend, in the fourth line, after the word "power" by inserting "under the direction of such court;" so as to read:

That every judge-advocate of a military court in the Army or Navy shall have power, under the direction of such court, to issue the like process, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move, further, to amend by adding to the bill:

And every such court shall have the same power to punish a witness for refusing obedience to such process or refusing to give evidence when lawfully thereto required possessed by the circuit court of the United States; but the order or judgment of such military court fining or committing any civilian witness shall be subject to review, upon habeas corpus or otherwise, by the circuit or district judge of the United States for the circuit or district in which such commitment may be made, and also by the circuit court of such district.

Mr. WHYTE. I think that amendment ought to go to some committee for examination. A court-martial, if I remember correctly, has power only to commit an officer or a private in the Army for two months for a contempt or refusal to answer. The time is limited.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator will observe that this applies to civilians only.

Mr. WHYTE. I know it does; but it gives greater power over civilians than over military men. There is no limit to the period for which the imprisonment may be ordered by the military court with regard to civilians, while under the Articles of War, if I remember correctly, no court-martial can imprison a witness for more than two months. I think there ought to be some limit. I hope that the bill will be sent to the Judiciary Committee, in order that it may be prepared in such form as will protect the rights of witnesses who may be summoned before courts-martial.

Mr. CRAGIN. I would say to the Senator from Maryland that this amendment has been prepared by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and submitted to several other gentlemen, and is believed to be correct. There is special reason why this bill should be passed at as early a time as possible. I believe it is correct, and I hope that there will be no further delay. My own judgment is that there is not the objection to this amendment that the Senator from Maryland supposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Judiciary Committee has not had anything to do with this amendment; but I myself, having made objection to the bill the other day, prepared this amendment, submitted it to some other gentlemen who were interested in protecting the rights of civilians, and then suggested it to the Senator from New Hampshire. It is true that a military court has no authority under the Articles of War to imprison for a military offense beyond a particular period of time, but they might continue to renew that and imprison as long as they liked until the court should be dissolved, which would be the upshot of it. But the answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, I think, is this: that civilian witnesses in these courts are put upon precisely the same ground that they stand in any other court, in a civil court. There is no limitation in respect of time to the power of a civil court to punish a witness for contempt, either in not obeying the subpœna or in refusing to give evidence, or otherwise misconducting himself. It is left to the sound discretion of the tribunal.

I agree that in one view there would be great force in what my friend from Maryland says as to committing this unlimited power to a military tribunal, which is temporary, and therefore may commit a party so much longer than its own existence that there would be no way of getting him out but by a pardon, provided their commitment would not fall at the expiration of their existence, as probably it would. But the Senator will perceive that the judgment of a military court in respect of a civilian witness, in fining or committing him for contempt, is the subject of review by a civil judge of that locality, so that if a witness feels that he has had too heavy a sentence imposed upon him for his misconduct, or that the sentence is wrong in any other respect, he has only to apply to the judge of the United States court for that district, and he can be brought up and the civil judge can determine whether the sentence is just or not. The civilian has by that step all the protection and in fact rather more than a civilian witness has in a civil court. But of course I shall have no objection to an amendment which limits it, if the Senator thinks that desirable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is great force in what the Senator from Vermont says in reference to the right of a party who might be committed for contempt to appeal to the judge of the district court, and have his remedy by habeas corpus. That is true in time of peace, but we all know that in time of war that remedy might be wanting to the civilian.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I would suggest to my friend that in time of war that remedy would be wanting to the civilian and the military man and everybody else, if we had all the laws on the subject in the world, as we have found out in the last ten years. The statute does not help him then.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is very unfortunate that precedents for the violation of the habeas corpus act have been so frequent in this country as they have been. That is the great writ which protects the rights and liberties of the people, and the precedents for its violation have been entirely too numerous in the recent history of this country; but I cannot consent that the liberties of this country should be placed at the discretion of military courts-martial, as they have been known to be constituted of late years. They are not always composed of regular officers of the Army, men who have been accustomed to military life and who know the obligations imposed upon military men, but very frequently courts-martial are composed, in part at least, of men who have not had that experience either in civil or military life which renders them competent judges to pass on the rights of others. I shall, therefore, not consent by my vote to the amendment, and I think the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland a very wise one, that it should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, in order that it may be so guarded that the rights of all may be protected.

Mr. WHYTE. I am not willing, without making some protest at least, that a civilian witness before a court-martial shall be in a worse position than a military witness. According to my recollection courts-martial are limited, as I said before, in punishing military witnesses to a period of two months. I therefore propose this amendment to be added to the pending amendment, so that a civilian at least shall stand upon a like footing:

Provided also, That no imprisonment imposed on such civilian for contempt in refusing to give evidence shall continue for more than two months.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to know whether there is not an implication from that amendment that such witnesses may be imprisoned for two months. Now, according to my notions on this subject, a civilian cannot be imprisoned longer than the court continues if that proviso be not inserted. If that proviso be added to it, and that by implication gives the power to keep a civilian imprisoned for two months, he might be imprisoned for six weeks when there was no power to discharge him, though he was prepared to purge himself of the contempt. I think it is a pretty well established rule that a court will not punish for contempt without giving an opportunity to purge from the contempt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 22, noes 18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no one in the Senate, I imagine, who objects to the general purpose or object of the Senator from Maryland; but I think he can change his amendment so that everybody may agree to it. Certainly no one can desire to put a civilian witness in a worse position than a military witness before a court-martial. If a civilian is summoned as a witness and refuses to testify, he ought to stand on the same footing as a soldier or sailor who refuses to testify—no more, no less. It seems to me that the wording of the amendment ought to be made more satisfactory to the Senate. It has been already adopted, but it may be amended. I suggest to him that, instead of reading as it does, "Provided also, that no imprisonment imposed on such civilian for contempt in refusing to give evidence shall continue for more than two months," it should read: "Such imprisonment shall only extend or continue as long as that of a soldier or sailor under like circumstances," or words to that effect.

That avoids the controversy. I am inclined to think that, on the expiration of the court-martial summoning him, a witness is discharged; and also that, whenever the witness comes forward and purges himself of the contempt, he is entitled to be discharged. That is my idea. I simply want to place the civilian on precisely the same footing with the soldier or sailor under the same circumstances.

Mr. WHYTE. The language which I used in my amendment was drawn hurriedly here at my desk. The language used is the language used in all criminal procedure. It is a limit. The period shall not exceed two months, but of course the whole of it is within the discretion of the court, and if the military court is about to adjourn it has only to have the party brought before it, give him an opportunity of purging himself of the contempt, and allow him to testify. It is only putting the civilian in like position with the military offender who refuses to give evidence; and, according to my recollection—I cannot lay my hand on the statute at this moment—I have used the very words employed in regard to military witnesses. There is no provision of this kind in the Revised Statutes in regard to the Navy, but, according to my recollection, it applies only to the Army.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is probably the Article of War for the Navy, to which the Senator from Maryland refers, to be found on the two hundred and eighty-third page of the Revised Statutes, article 42:

Whenever any person refuses to give his evidence, or to give it in the manner provided by these articles, or prevaricates, or behaves with contempt to the court, it shall be lawful for the court to imprison him for any time not exceeding two months.

Mr. SHERMAN. The language seems to be the same, but perhaps some such phraseology as this might meet the idea better:

Such imprisonment shall not be for a longer period than that imposed on a soldier or sailor for a similar offense.

I suppose, as the Senator from Vermont has read the law now, it does not make much difference. The language already in the amendment conforms to the law, and I withdraw the suggestion I made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The objection is to the law. It ought not to have any limit.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARVEY. A week ago I gave notice that I should to-day ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 34, to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limit of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department. I hope I shall now be able to have the bill taken up.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be glad to know the wishes of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] before another bill is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks for the present consideration of the bill which he has named. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think perhaps the resolution introduced by the Senator from West Virginia might as well be considered. It will take no more of our time now than at some future period.

Mr. HAMLIN. The resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has precedence by the action of the Senate yesterday; but inasmuch as the Senator from Massachusetts now desires to proceed to the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia and as it has been before the Senate, I do not interpose any objection; but I desire to give notice to the Senate that immediately upon closing the question upon which the Senator from Massachusetts is to speak I shall ask the Senate to take up the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont, and shall insist upon its consideration and settlement.

Mr. HARVEY. Inasmuch as the matters of which the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maine speak have precedence under the rules, if the Senator from Massachusetts desires to proceed now, of course I have no remedy; but I desire to renew the notice given a week ago that at the earliest opportunity I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 34.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the unfinished business be laid aside for the purpose of taking up the resolution introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] on the 12th instant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subject to a call for the regular order. The question is upon agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Whereas there appear to be material alterations and discrepancies in the official finance reports of the Treasury Department as to the annual expenditures, receipts of the Government and public debt, and particularly in the reports of 1869 to 1872, inclusive, which discrepancies and changes and alterations involve large amounts, and no satisfactory explanation appears on the face for the same: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the books and accounts of the Treasury Department, particularly with reference to discrepancies and alterations in amounts and figures that have been made in them, especially in the annual statements of the expenditures of the Government, revenue collected, and the public debt contained in said reports; and if any such discrepancies and alterations be found to exist, to report the same and the extent and nature thereof, the years wherein they occur, by what authority made if any, the reasons that induced them, and to report generally such other and further information bearing upon the subject as to them may seem best; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, when I addressed the Senate on Thursday last I stated the general principles by which I supposed all the explanations necessary to a full answer to the specifications made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] in his remarks could be furnished. I have nothing to add to-day to that statement in that respect. I wish now to say that, as well from the circumstance that the honorable Senator from West Virginia has thought proper to bring these alleged discrepancies to the attention of the Senate as from the circumstance that at various times and in various ways the attention of the country has been called to them, I have not only no disposition to oppose the examination suggested by the resolution, but I am in favor of such an examination, either by a special committee or by one of the standing committees of the Senate, as shall seem most expedient to those who are to pass upon the question.

It may not be out of place for me to repeat the statement I made on a former occasion, because I observe in reading the remarks, as they appear, which were then submitted to the Senate by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, he does leave the impression that in his mind not only were different statements of the affairs of the Treasury presented to Congress and to the country, but that the books of the Department had from time to time been changed for the purpose of furnishing the basis on which these different statements could be made; that there is no foundation, not even the least, for any such suggestion, and I have to say to the honorable Senator from West Virginia that if he will take the pains to examine the processes by which the accounts are kept in the Treasury Department, he will find that it would be so difficult a matter to change the accounts or the records of the accounts, after they have been made, that it may be said to be an impossibility.

I did give the Senate to understand that I should be able to furnish in detail the explanation of all the particular matters alleged by the honorable Senator from West Virginia for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but I find that the details in figures are so voluminous that it would not be expedient to publish them in the extent required, and that they would furnish upon the whole very little information to the general inquirer. I shall content myself, then, with stating the particulars in reference to each, as I believe, of the allegations made, and leave for the committee, when it shall be constituted or authorized, to explore the details for the purpose of ascertaining whether the statements are true.

The first definite statement made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia related to the annual expenditures from 1861 to 1866, including two statements, one drawn from the reports previous to 1870 and the other drawn from the report of 1870, showing a difference or increase in the latter report of the sum of $3,271,970.43. This difference is made up from many items. The entire amount of the difference shows an increase in the expenditures during the years mentioned of the sum of $3,271,970.43; and a summary explanation may be stated thus: In the finance report for 1869, page 321, are included outstanding warrants to the amount of $4,018,091.91 which do not appear in the report for 1870. In the report for 1870, page 275, are included trust funds to the amount of $7,290,062.54 which do not appear in the report for 1869. The difference between the two, the sum of $3,271,970.43, is the exact difference claimed to be an increase of expenditures, as shown by the statement. The difference is merely a difference in the manner of preparing the statements. In the one case the warrants were estimated at their full value, and in the other case by the amount that had actually been paid under or by authority of those warrants at the time the account was stated. The sum of seven millions and more of trust funds was originally kept in the Department as a separate account, not included in the annual expenditures of the Government; but when the latter statement was prepared this sum was included in the annual expenditures of the Government, and the difference is the amount of the increase as stated by the honorable Senator from West Virginia.

I may here remark, en passant, that it is one of the difficulties of administration which can, I submit, never be entirely overcome, that there will be a difference of opinion among subordinates—indeed, there would be a difference of opinion among superiors if their opinion could be had—as to the method or rule of tabulating the different expenditures of the Government. Sometimes, by a clerk in a given year, a particular expenditure is put under a definite head, and at another time this same clerk even, or a different clerk, may put the same expenditure under the miscellaneous head or under a different specific head. We have a most notable instance of that, which has existed without observation, but is known to most persons acquainted with the affairs of the Government. There is a trust fund of $14,000,000, the income of which is devoted to the payment of naval pensions. It stands upon the books of the Department and is reported to Congress in the monthly debt statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury as a debt of the United States; but, as a matter of fact, the principal is never to be paid. There is also a large sum of money, the precise amount of which I cannot state, received by the Government for the support of the Smithsonian Institution, on which, as I understand, the Government is bound perpetually to pay a certain sum. There is no real difference in these two items of expenditure by the Government. Different persons might very well come to different conclusions as to whether this income or this expenditure should be capitalized and the amount charged as a debt against the Government, while others might be of the opinion that the annuity is merely an annual expenditure of the Government, like the payment of the President's salary, which is to continue probably as long as the Government lasts. This is only an instance of the differences which arise; it is a notable instance; and when you come to the mere details in the Treasury Department, it is exceedingly difficult to go on year after year and to require and secure compliance with the requisition of carrying on all sorts of expenditure under precisely the same head.

The next specific statement by the honorable Senator from West Virginia is this. He says:

> The net ordinary expenditures of the Government for the year 1865, as stated in the finance report for 1869, are $1,212,911,270.41. The same expenditures for the same year, as stated in the finance report for 1870, are $1,214,349,195.43, showing an increase of $1,437,925.02.

In the preparation of these two statements different data are included under the head of "net ordinary expenditures." For instance, in the finance report of 1869 there was included an item for the purchase of gold coin authorized by the first section of the act of March 17, 1862, amounting to $5,072,900.11. Under the same head there was also a payment of $735,416.93 of outstanding warrants which belonged to previous years, these two items amounting to $5,808,304.04. In the report for 1870 the items of trust funds, namely, Chickasaw and Choctaw and Navy pension fund, amounting to $7,242,242, are included under the head of "net ordinary expenses," precisely as I before stated in reference to a similar matter under the head of expenditures. The difference between these two accounts represents the discrepancy referred to, $1,433,937.96.

The next item relates to pension expenditures. In the report of 1872, as stated by the honorable Senator from West Virginia—and his statement I believe is correct—the expenditures for pensions are stated for the year 1864-'65 at $16,347,621.34. In the report of 1869 the same expenditures for the same year are stated at $9,291,610.48. The latter, a small sum, represents the amount of pensions actually paid to persons authorized to receive pensions under the laws of the United States. There had accumulated in the Treasury Department an amount of money, $7,000,000 and more, arising from naval operations or forfeitures under the laws, which had been placed on the books of the Department to the credit of the pension appropriations, whether wisely or not I cannot say. It was a transaction that occurred many years before I had anything to do with the Treasury; but, nevertheless, it was placed there. By an act of Congress this amount was set out from that appropriation and made a part of the capital of the naval-pension fund, on which interest at the rate of 3 per cent. is paid by the Government, this being a part of the $14,000,000 of which I have before spoken. When this change was made, which was merely a transfer on the books of the Department, there was a charge made against the pension-appropriation account of $7,000,000, and transferred and credited as a part of the capital of the $14,000,000 of the naval-pension fund. When the accounts were revised in 1870, this individual thing was not a matter of which the Secretary had any knowledge at the time; but the chief clerk, Mr. Saville, of whom I think I may say here that he is without a rival in the country for his capacity in the matter of accounting, saw fit to place that as a charge against the pension account. Whether it was wise or not I cannot say; but it was necessary to dispose of it in some way, and unless gentlemen can show some other and better way the time has not come to complain of that way.

The next item shows a discrepancy of $5,840.73. That is explained by the circumstance to which I have referred, that warrants drawn had not been paid in full, and when the analysis was made there was a difference of that amount.

> Says the honorable Senator from West Virginia—
> the expenditures for pensions in the year 1870 are stated at $28,340,202.17.
> In the report of 1874—
> The last report preceding that which we now have—> the same expenditures for the same year (1870) are stated at $28,402,241.20, showing an increase in the report of 1874 over 1870 of $62,039.03.

This is explained in the same way: warrants drawn in prior years and paid that year.

The next item is naval expenditures, showing an increase in the report of 1871 over the report of 1869, in naval expenditures for the year 1865, of $49,657.95, the amount of outstanding warrants paid, including the naval and hospital fund.

The next item relates to the War Department. The honorable Senator says:

In the report of 1871 the expenditures of the War Department are put down in the annual statement of Government expenditures for the year 1862-'63 at	$603,314,411 82
In the report of 1869 the same expenditures for the same year, as appears in the annual statement of expenditures, is stated at	599,298,600 83
Showing an increase in the figures of the report of 1871 over the report of 1869 for the year 1863 of	4,015,800 99

Now, it happens that at the close of that year there were outstanding warrants, that is, warrants on which the full amount had not been paid, amounting to $5,306,612.24, and at the end of the year there were still outstanding warrants which had been drawn previous to the commencement of that year amounting to $1,290,801.25, showing $4,015,810.99, being within $10 of the precise amount, according to the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia. That $10 thus far has not been explained.

The expenditures of the Indian Department for the year 1870 are stated by the Senator from West Virginia as follows:

In the report for the year 1870 the expenses in the Indian Department for the year 1863 are reported in the statement of annual expenditures at	$3,152,032 70
While in the report for the year 1868 these same expenses are reported for the same year at	1,076,326 35
Showing an increase in the figures of the report of 1870 over the report of 1868 in the Indian expenditures for the same year of	2,075,706 35

Somebody has to plead guilty to an error there. If the honorable Senator from West Virginia will look at the statement he will observe that the Indian expenses and the pension expenses are in parallel columns, one following the other. It happened that one year, 1868, the compositor set up the figures which should have been placed under the head of "Indian expenses" under the head of "pensions." They were exactly reversed. The next year each was put in its proper place, and the country is indebted to the honorable Senator from West Virginia for compelling us to make this discovery.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish simply to ask whether I am to understand from the Senator that the discrepancy which he has spoken of exists only in the reports of 1870 and 1868?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have not looked at the accounts myself but the years are 1870 and 1868, according to the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia. One account was made in 1870 and the other in 1868. I should say, however, that when the accounts were investigated in 1870 and 1871 there was a difference of seven or eight thousand dollars in the amount of one of these items due to the circumstance of which I have often spoken, that warrants had been drawn and were outstanding not paid; but otherwise the statement I believe is true.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I have not the figures before me, but my impression is that the Senator will find a different state of things. I think there is a discrepancy in several reports.

Mr. SHERMAN. The first statement is correct?

Mr. BOUTWELL. They were transposed one year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Which is the correct one?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not prepared at this moment to say which is the correct one, but they were transposed, so that what the Senator from West Virginia says, that there appeared to be that change, actually did appear. That is, the pension expenses one year were put under the head of the Indian expenses and the Indian expenses at the same time were put under the head of pension expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was done by the printer.

Mr. BOUTWELL. By the printer. It was not discovered in time, but the change was made back again the next year with an alteration of about $8,000 finally, in consequence of warrants drawn and not paid; so that one of those accounts was changed.

Mr. CONKLING. The transposition was not on the books of the Department?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It did not touch the books of the Department. It was merely a mistake in the printing office, which was not observed by the proof-reader. The Senator from West Virginia says:

> I come next to the discrepancies in the statements of revenue collected.
> In the finance report for 1863, in the annual statement of revenue collected for that year, we find the internal revenue stated at $37,640,787 95

Then he goes on to say—it is not a very definite statement, as I understand it—that afterward this sum one year, or a sum equal to this, disappeared from the receipts and afterward re-appeared. The simple truth about it is this that a clerk in the Treasury Department, the public-debt account standing upon the sheet from which he prepared his statement for the printer immediately below the receipts of internal revenue for that year, added the receipts from internal revenue into the public debt. It was a gross mistake, inexcusable; but that is the fact. It was afterward explained in the reports, but I suppose it escaped the observation of the honorable Senator from West Virginia. The error was corrected in a subsequent report.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope I do not interfere, but the Senator should do me the justice to state whether I did not say myself that it afterward appeared. I made a statement to that effect.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then it was rather uncalled for to ask me to make the explanation. I admit very freely that I did see something in the remarks made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia which led me to think that he suspected that his statement as originally made was not entirely accurate, but as I was not sure whether he had reached that conclusion I felt bound to remark upon it.

Mr. DAVIS. In justice to myself, I must ask the Senator whether he finds a single statement or a single figure in the remarks which I made the other day to be incorrect?

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is the business I am engaged in.

Mr. DAVIS. Perhaps I have not made myself understood. I ask the Senator again whether he finds that I stated any figures that the financial reports do not bear me out in?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am bound to say that, so far as I have observed, the figures employed or used by the Senator from West Virginia are to be found in the reports of the Treasury Department.

I come now to the gravest part of the case as presented by the honorable Senator from West Virginia. He brings together from the reports of the Register of the Treasury a statement of the public debt for each year from 1862 to 1870, as contained in the report of 1870-'71, aggregating $19,272,555,561.57, and he also brings together the statement of the debt of the United States by years for the same years, as reported in 1871, amounting to $19,023,595,208.63, showing a difference or increase of $248,960,352.94. Now, then, before I proceed to state more in detail the explanation of this difference I have to say that this is the most extraordinary use of figures I have ever observed in order to reach a conclusion. Here are eight years, I think. If, as was the case, the public debt appeared to be greater in one year on account of the mode of keeping books in the Register's office, to which I have already referred, by the sum of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, and though it might remain precisely at that figure or a similar figure each year, yet by bringing together eight years, in each of which there was a statement authoritatively and fairly made according to the method of keeping books, yet you can see that the aggregation of these differences would present a state of facts very different from the actual truth. I must say I was a good deal puzzled, and I do not know but that I ought to recognize the skill of the honorable Senator from West Virginia in this particular. I have no doubt that he thought it a proper way of presenting the case, but I think, after all, it was calculated to produce an erroneous impression.

The explanation in detail of these differences involves a great deal of work. At the Treasury Department they have been over two or three of the years to which the attention of the Senate was called, and I am prepared to state in sufficient detail to enable Senators to comprehend the facts in regard to two of those years, and I think I am justified in saying that in substance the explanation will be the same in regard to the others.

The later report does show an increase of the public debt, and there is one admission to be made in all frankness, and I do not know but that it is an admission of a fact which ought to be condemned. It is this: The Register of the Treasury, certainly without my knowledge, for two years, and perhaps three, reported the debt of the United States according to the statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which the cash on hand was deducted from the outstanding liabilities on hand. I refer to the monthly statement, with which everybody is familiar, and the mode by which it is prepared is perfectly well understood. I agree entirely that the Register of the Treasury should have taken his own figures, either by the books of issue or by the warrants of receipts and expenditures, both of which were at his command, and should not have adopted the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and especially have adopted it so as to have deducted the cash on hand from the outstanding liabilities of the Government. He ought to have stated according to his own books. I make that admission, and take whatever responsibility belongs to me, although I was ignorant of the fact until my attention was now called to the subject.

In the report for 1871, which is one of the years to which the attention of the Senate has been called, the statement of the public debt represents the principal of the debt as made from receipts and expenditures. That for the year 1870 is made up from entirely different data, principally from the loan accounts. Other items are included, however, as will be made apparent from the following analysis:

The statement in the report of 1870 of the amount for the year appears as given, $2,386,358,591.74. The data from which this was made up are as follows:

Principal of the debt	$2,601,675,127 83
To which is added interest accrued	50,607,556 52
Making total debt, principal and interest	2,652,282,684 35
From this amount were deducted—
Coin in the Treasury	112,776,048 88
Currency in the Treasury	28,945,067 19
Sinking fund in United States coin-interest bonds with accrued interest thereon, and other coin-interest bonds purchased with accrued interest thereon	124,202,968 54
Leaving the amount of the debt as above stated, less cash in the Treasury and bonds with interest thereon	2,386,358,599 74

The amount of the debt in the report of 1871, which of course was larger for the fiscal year 1870, is stated at $2,480,672,427.81, and represents the exact principal of the debt after deducting the principal of the bonds purchased on sinking-fund account, and excluding the item of accrued interest as above stated, and also the entire amount of cash in the Treasury.

The statement for the fiscal year 1869 was prepared in precisely the same manner and with the same results. The chief difficulty in regard to these accounts arose from the circumstances that the Register used the statement of the public debt made by the Secretary of the Treasury, which included accrued interest on the one hand, and from the aggregate so obtained the cash in the Treasury was deducted. This was an erroneous proceeding on his part.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts when it was that the Government commenced issuing the monthly statement of the public debt, including the accrued interest?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The first monthly statements which contained the interest were issued probably in July, 1869. I had a statement made up representing the debt of the United States with the accrued interest as it stood on the 1st day of March, 1869; that was when my predecessor was in office; but the first regular statement in which interest earned was considered as a part of the public debt was made up, I think, on the 1st of July, 1869; and it was that circumstance that gave rise to this difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason I ask the question is this: I notice that these apparent but not real discrepancies occured mostly in 1869 and 1870.

Mr. BOUTWELL. They did.

Mr. SHERMAN. And grew out of the fact that the statement of the public debt then included interest and also the money on hand.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes. That was, I agree, an error and misfortune, although no harm has come to anybody.

The next specific item of complaint is in this: The honorable Senator from West Virginia says:

In the finance report for 1874 the public debt is stated for the years—
1872	$2,253,251,078 78
1873	2,234,482,743 20
Decrease for that year	18,768,335 58

On page 5 of the finance report for 1873 the Secretary says the decrease for that year was $43,667,630.05, making a difference of $24,899,324.47.

In the finance report for 1874 the public debt for 1874 is stated at	$2,251,690,218 43
In the same report the public debt for 1873 is stated at	2,234,482,743 20
Increase, according to these figures, in 1874 over 1873	17,207,475 23

These figures are from the Register's report of 1874, page 496. The Secretary's new table, page 9, differs very slightly from the above. It will be seen by this statement that the debt has increased over seventeen millions between 1873 and 1874, instead of decreased, as claimed. It is true that there is a foot-note explaining this, but it is my opinion that if the debt is actually decreased the figures and annual statements should show it without necessity of explanation of any kind.

And the foot-note was this:

NOTE.—It will be seen that the increase of the principal of the public debt, as shown by this statement, appears to be $17,207,475.23. Congress, by act of June 8, 1872, (17 Statutes, 336,) provided that national banking associations might deposit United States legal-tender notes in the Treasury of the United States and receive therefor certificates of deposit bearing no interest, and that the notes so deposited should be set apart and held as a special deposit for the redemption of said certificates. The certificates outstanding on the 1st day of July, and included in the outstanding principal of the debt, amounted to $58,760,000, and the notes held as a special deposit for their redemption were included in the cash balance in the Treasury on that day. It will be seen, therefore, that while these certificates, as a matter of accounts, are treated as a part of the public debt, they do not in reality form any portion of it, in the usual sense of the word, for the reason that no revenue is required to be provided for their payment, the notes which they represent always being in the Treasury as a special deposit for their redemption and those notes being included in the outstanding legal-tender notes. Omitting these certificates of deposits as offset by the notes held on deposit for their redemption, the actual reduction of the principal of the debt was $41,552,524.77.

With this foot-note before him I do not understand the process of reasoning or the principle in morals by which the honorable Senator from West Virginia could state to the Senate that, instead of there having been a reduction of over $41,000,000 in the public debt, there was an actual increase of over $17,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator asks my explanation. The statement made by me as printed shows that I said it was so according to the figures. I did not say it was the case in fact. I said, on the contrary, that there was a foot-note explaining this.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, Mr. President, for what purpose are figures except to enable people to ascertain some fact, not to support a theory which has no foundation in reason or in law or in justice? Did not the Senator, when he read that foot-note, know that for $58,000,000 of the so-called public debt there was in the Treasury $58,000,000 of United States notes which were held to re-imburse the owners of those certificates whenever they called for them, and that the aggregate of the public debt could only be increased by adding those certificates to the principal of the public debt, and refusing to consider the offset in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. President, I have, I believe, considered every one of the specific allegations made in the speech of the honorable Senator from West Virginia. I not only assent to the reference of this resolution to a committee, but I think it proper that it should go to a committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, there have been a great many figures produced in the course of this debate, and it is impossible for me to carry them in my mind. I cannot therefore say whether or not the explanations made as far even as the Senator went are complete. I take it that it is probable they are, but there are still two or three hundred million dollars, according to the figures I gave the Senator, and he says they ought to be facts, which are unaccounted for. When he says that the figures ought to tell the truth I agree with him. If so, then I say according to the figures, taken in his own way, there are discrepancies to the amount of two or three hundred million dollars yet to be explained. I have never said, nor do I believe now, that anything like that amount has gone astray. Certainly there may be explanations, as the Senator has stated, but the Senator, as I understand him, has all the way through admitted that every single figure that I produced is correct, and has been taken from the regular reports. He has said, however, that there has been no change in the books. He admits that there has been change in the annual statements to Congress year after year. Now, sir, is it possible that reports are made to Congress which the books do not sustain? Is it possible that we have been receiving reports from year to year, and for eight or ten years in succession, which do not agree with the books? That is a still worse state of things than I supposed could exist. If Congress and the country receive reports stating one set of facts and the books state another, then, indeed, it is time for examination. I understand the Senator to admit that fact.

I should also be glad to know how this new table of 1870 was made up. It seems to have made its first appearance in 1870; it seems to have changed the annual reports, if not the books, to a very considerable extent, and I take it the annual reports should be made from the books whether they are or not. The new table makes material changes, and those changes are nearly always to advanced figures. It has been the duty of the Register of the Treasury, as I understand, it, from the beginning of the Government, to make up statements of the public expenditures, of the revenue, and of the public debt, and he has made his regular annual reports, and up to 1870 they agreed very well, there being but slight differences. Sometimes some few figures differed; but between 1869 and 1870, and certainly between 1869 and 1871, this new table of the Secretary of the Treasury, as the Senator himself has called it, appears, and that table changes the figures in the Register's report very materially.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator tell us whether it is not true, as a matter of business necessity, that there is no day in the year when the amount of the public debt would appear on the books of the Register to be the same for that year that it does on the books in the Secretary's office, from the very necessity of business?

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the Senator's question, and I will answer it as near as I can. I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts that up to 1870 there was no table kept in the Secretary's office. Since 1870 there has been. I understand, too, that before a statement is made up at the end of the year, no matter what the debt may be during the year on a particular day, there are forty-five days allowed to get in all outstanding warrants, and regulate all differences that may occur between the two offices, and that not only are those forty-five days generally taken, but sometimes they go even up to November, I am told. If such is the case there are two or three or four months to get in the differences, if there are differences, between the Secretary and the Register. But I cannot understand, I will say to the Senator from Vermont, when the Register once makes up his table and reports it to Congress, and puts down $10,000,000 or $1,000,000,000—it makes no difference what the amount—how, five years after that, or one year after, those figures can be changed. I do not understand how that can be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that the figures on the books of the Register's office have been changed in any instance, to his knowledge or belief?

Mr. DAVIS. The facts are stated as I find them without my belief, for I have not much belief in this matter yet. I hope, though, there will finally be some one who will get the real facts in the case. Take the report of 1862, if you please. Mr. Chase reported that the debt was $516,000,000; I speak in round numbers. The Register stated that it was $514,000,000, and so reported to Congress. Mr. Chase, in discussing the situation of the country, said it was $514,000,000. Each annual report of the Register from that day up to 1871—I think certainly up to 1870—continued to say it was $514,000,000; but the report of 1870 or 1871 said it was $524,000,000, a difference of $10,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now the Senator has not answered my question; perhaps he has forgotten it. The question which I put to my honorable friend was this: when he speaks about changes being made in the books of the Register's Office, does he mean to say that he has understood or believed that any change of entries has been made, like striking out a standing entry and putting something else in its place? That was my question.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not had an opportunity of examining the books, and have not asked for it. I take the finance reports, and I believe they ought to, if they do not, represent the books from which they purport to be taken. When a report is made to Congress or to the country, I believe it represents the books; and if that be so, I say the reports which have been sent to Congress from year to year have been changed. Now, whether the books have or have not been changed, I cannot say. I hope they have not been; but the statements that have been sent to Congress certainly have been; and if the statements are not taken from the books, where are they taken from?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I guess they are taken from the books.

Mr. DAVIS. If they are, they have been changed, for the finance reports have been changed, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has admitted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean, in the sense in which he is wishing to have the country understand, that if he, as my counsel in a lawsuit—and I certainly could not have a better one—last term charged me with $500 for attending to a motion and next term finds that he has paid since the last term $50 for clerk's fees, and he adds that to my account, he has been changing his books?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir, I do not mean that; but I mean that if I should go back and change the original entry to a different amount that would be changing it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Decidedly; and yet when the Senator reported to me a statement of the account he would report it as it stood each time and the two statements would differ just as these do.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is clear that there has been no change of the books.

Mr. DAVIS. Now the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio both say the books have not been changed. Of course they speak with knowledge. I take it they would not say so unless they knew it. Then will either of these Senators tell me how it is that the reports to Congress have been changed if they are not taken from the books?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is amazing that my friend and I cannot understand each other. I have no doubt at all that the books in the Register's Office, in the sense of having additional entries made in them, are changed every day. They ought to be if there is any business going on in the Treasury Department. If those entries are made as entries in books of account generally are, by putting figures into columns where there are already some, when you foot them up again there will be a change in the footing. Therefore, I take it to be true that the entries in the Register's books are changed from day to day in that sense. But the Senator certainly is not making this great display over the country for the sake of having the people know that business is going on in the Register's Office. The point, if there is any point about it at all, is to have people understand or suspect or fear that the Register's books have been tampered with. That is the proposition, if there is anything to it at all. I happen to know, from a personal examination of several months, made with the assistance of the then honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Buckalew, one of the most honored members of my friend's own party, and deservedly so, that this notion of any of the books of the Treasury ever having been tampered with at all is an entire error, and there is nothing of the kind. And yet, as I say, you can see from the very fact of there being three or four departments in the Treasury through which accounts must go, and go for the very purpose of having checks upon each other and for the safety of the people, that you can never on a given day make those respective accounts agree, and you never ought to. If they did agree, you would suspect at once from the course of business that there was collusion.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to say that I have not stated at any time but what the amounts on the books ought to change from day to day? On the contrary, I know they ought to change from day to day; but after they have been made up and reported for five or six or more years to Congress, they ought not to be changed. That is my position.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Is it true that after 1870 the Register's account and the account kept in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury do agree for a series of years?

Mr. DAVIS. I was just coming to that.

Mr. THURMAN. If that is so, then, according to the remark of the Senator from Vermont, there must have been some collusion or fraud.

Mr. DAVIS. My friend from Ohio has anticipated me, and very properly anticipated me. If the Senator from Massachusetts, or the Senator from Vermont, or any other Senator will take the trouble to look, he will find that previous to 1860 the reports of the Register agreed very well, from the beginning of the Government down; but between 1860 and 1870 they do not agree by large amounts; and between 1871 and the present day they agree again. They run along very well and very regularly. How is it that between the ten years I have named they change constantly and for two, three, or four years afterward they do not change? I admit that changes ought to take place during the year, and I had attempted to state that the law has given forty-five days, and practice has taken three or four months, to close up the accounts after the end of the fiscal year; and after that the statements ought not to disagree; yet it is a fact that they do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator now wishes to know how it is to be accounted for, then, that in the very last three or four years the statements do agree pretty well. In speaking of figures, I suppose figures either agree as a positive and absolute term or disagree. If the Senator means to say that the footings in the Register's books, of the statement of the public debt for illustration, or any other of the accounts of the business of the Government, on any given day in the last three or four years, agree exactly; that is, agree—there is no need of the word "exactly" about it—with the statement in the books of the auditor and in the warrant division of the Secretary's Office, and so on, then I must beg leave to differ with him; because I do not believe they do. But if by "very well" he means that they come within forty rows of apple-trees—that is, they disagree in greater or less sums from year to year, which in these years do not happen to be so large—that I can understand; and it fortifies what I was saying, that they never do agree.

Mr. DAVIS. My recollection is that since 1871 they agree to a cent; that is, after the figures are once reported to Congress in the annual report, there are no changes since that time. But in 1870 the debt was reported as such an amount, and when the report of 1871 or 1875 comes in it is changed, and made a larger or a smaller amount. Since 1871 the figures agree, as I believe, and no changes have occurred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is because I do not think the Register of the Treasury has made any report in the year 1873, for instance, about the year 1870. He made a report in 1870 about the preceding year, and then in 1871 he made a report about that year; but this report to which the Senator is referring of the Secretary of the Treasury respecting the state of things in what is called his office, that branch of the Treasury Department, as has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, was a revisory report; not a revision of facts or of wrongs, but a revision of double-entry book-keeping, by which certain things which had been charged to one set of accounts were turned over and charged to another, and so on.

Now, if the Senator thinks that that is a very large ground of criticism, he and I entirely disagree. I am bound to say, although the Senator from Massachusetts is present now, that I think one of the good things he did while he was Secretary of the Treasury—and he did a great many—was to go through all these very accounts and endeavor to simplify and bring them more into harmony and unison, if it were possible, by having items which were proper items in the expenditures of the Government changed from one account to another where they more properly belonged; and that, of course, under particular heads would change the amounts of the public expenditures for that year, and under the other heads in the way that has been already so well stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. That is not the point. The real point between the Senator from West Virginia and the rest of us is that what he has said would lead people who did not understand it to believe as a fact from his statement (and that is an important and a serious thing) that the affairs in the Treasury Department had been conducted to the robbery of the public treasury—that is the short of it—and that money had been received which had not been accounted for or that money had been paid out which had not been charged for, or something of that kind—some real wrong. If we are really taking up the time of the Senate only in a consideration of the best methods of keeping double-entry accounts and of checks and balances, as a mere matter of form, then I confess I do not care much about engaging in it.

But what struck me in the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia and gave me some pain—because I was sure he was wrong in his facts; I mean in the facts to be deduced from what he said—was that he suggested that there had been a tampering with the books, or false entries, or false payments, or unaccounted-for receipts, which, if true, would do great injury to the credit of the country and to the respect which honest men ought to have for an honest administration of affairs. If that is not the substantial point he is driving at, then I have no quarrel with him or his criticisms as to whether an expenditure on one account should be charged to account A or account B.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator has spoken of double-entry book-keeping twice, I believe. I understand that there is no such thing in the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is triple or quadruple, I should have said, perhaps.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that there is not what is known as double-entry book-keeping in the Department. I believe I am correct. The Senator from Massachusetts knows whether he inaugurated it or not; but I do not think he will say that what is commonly known as double-entry book-keeping prevails in the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In order to get at the proper solution of this fresh ground of difficulty for this country, I must ask the Senator what he understands double-entry book-keeping to be?

Mr. DAVIS. I have not talked of double-entry book-keeping further than the Senator has named it, and I state what I believe to be the fact in regard to its use in the Treasury Department.

The Senator, without intending it I think, has drawn a conclusion as to what he imagines was my object in citing the figures I have presented. I know that Senator too well to believe that he would misrepresent myself or any other gentleman. The Senator cannot put his finger on a single sentence in anything that I have said which spoke about robbery or collusion. The Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Vermont, as I understand, have both admitted that my figures are correct, and not in a single instance incorrect. They both have admitted, at least the Senator from Massachusetts has, that part of my ground was well taken. He has gone over very many of the figures from a statement prepared, as I am led to believe, for him by the Treasury Department. The answer, then, that the Senator from Massachusetts has made is the answer of the Treasury Department, as I understand from him.

Now, Mr. President, I wish here to state, for I did not think it was necessary previously, that I have had no intention whatever, no desire whatever, to throw discredit on any particular person, or even to bring discredit upon the nation in any manner or to injure the credit of the nation. If there are abuses in the Treasury Department, I think they ought to be corrected; the Senator from Vermont thinks they ought to be corrected; and certainly no Senator here will state that I have misrepresented anything. The Senator from Massachusetts has admitted over and over again that I was correct in my figures. He has admitted the figures in the annual reports to Congress have been changed years after they have been reported here, but he says the books have not been tampered with, and so says the Senator from Vermont. My question was, if that be so, how did the statements come to Congress? Is it possible that statements come here which the books do not bear out? I have asked two or three times, without an answer, how that new table of 1870 was made, and from what data it was made. Was it made from the Register's books, or was it made from some other division that I know not of? Certainly the first time it appeared was in 1870, and when it did appear, it appeared to increase the public debt very largely.

Now, by way of illustration, let me say that this is not only true of the public debt and the expenditures, but the figures of the revenue collected from year to year, after having been reported to Congress for a number of years, have been changed and the amounts made less. If Senators will take the trouble to look, as I have done, to the tables themselves, they will see that in the year 1862 the gross revenue as collected was reported at $51,939,000. If we take the report of 1871, we find that it says that in 1862 there were $51,907,000 of revenue collected, making a difference and decrease of $32,000,000. I suppose the first report was of the revenue collected after it had been covered into the Treasury. It was so reported for a number of years, and yet ten years afterward it was reported there was a less amount of revenue collected in that year than the report for that year showed. For the next year, 1863, you will find that there was a difference of $38,000,000. That was the year that the $37,000,000 disappeared connected with the internal revenue, which is but a million less, and that re-appeared in the report a year or two afterward; but let me say that when that disappeared the line that contained the Treasury notes and loans was raised so as to make the grand total about the same.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does not the Senator understand what has been already explained, and which I believe he had the means of knowing before he brought the matter to the notice of the Senate, that it was a clerical error, which was corrected as soon as it was discovered; that the thirty-seven millions disappeared one year as an internal-revenue receipt and the aggregate of the public debt was swollen to the same extent, and the next year, when the error was corrected, the public-debt account was diminished just to that extent, and the internal-revenue item re-appeared? It was before my time. I am not in any way responsible for it. Does not the Senator understand that that was the error of a subordinate clerk in the Department, and did not really involve any responsibility upon any other person? It was a mistake by which no harm came to anybody.

Mr. DAVIS. I have so stated each time I have referred to it. For each amount that I have given if I could find an explanation I have always stated it. Just here let me say to my friend the Senator from Massachusetts that certainly on one occasion in public, and it is the only one I will speak of, he has said to me that I should have gone to the Treasury Department and had these discrepancies explained. I wish now to tell that Senator that I did all in my power in that direction, and I so stated in words and in effect to the Senator before he made his public statement of what I ought to have done. I thought it did not come very well from him, after I had in personal conversation intimated to him that I had done so, to tell me in public what my duty was. It is true I had done just what he intimated I should have done, and what I have no doubt he was correct in saying if I had not done I should have done. But this thirty-eight millions of dollars the Senator says he knew about; it was about thirty-seven millions in round numbers when it disappeared from the internal revenue, but it came back thirty-eight millions. What I complain of in that particular is that when it did disappear it was made up in loans and Treasury notes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does the Senator suppose that there was any intention to make it up in the aggregate of the loans? Was there any motive existing on the part of anybody in the midst of a perilous war to increase the aggregate of the public debt thirty-seven millions? It was a mistake by a clerk, who was adding up the public debt on his sheet, and right above it was the item of thirty-seven millions of internal revenue, which probably was not separated by a distinct line, and he added it into the public debt, and it disappeared as an internal-revenue receipt. There could not have been any intention on the part of anybody to deceive the country.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not stated that there was any intention to deceive. I have gone over this thirty-seven millions item to show how easy it was to drop thirty-seven millions, such a small amount, and pick it up again when it was necessary. That was the only motive, and I have so stated a half-dozen times.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I might suggest to my friend from West Virginia that a good illustration of what he is now impressing on the Senate is in the story—I have no doubt it is true—of the Scotch merchant who told his friend that his balance-sheet made up by his clerk made him £1,790 richer than he knew he was; he had made it that year, and that the rascal did it by adding the year of our Lord at the top when he started on his column of figures. And this "bad boy" in the Treasury Department seems to have done something of the same sort.

Mr. DAVIS. There appear to be a good many bad boys in the Treasury Department, and I hope some of them will be found out. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. They evidently will in this way.

Mr. DAVIS. I tell you, Mr. President, that while this item of $37,000,000 is explained, and while the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Vermont are very ready to take up what I admit, it is to be noticed that the other decrease in the revenue-figures after they had been reported for ten years neither of the Senators has said anything about; and now I am going to bring to your attention another year in which the revenue decreased, and I will thank either of the Senators to correct me in it, or to say "bad boy" about that.

In 1864 the report of that year says there was collected of revenue $264,626,000. The report of 1871 says it was not $264,626,000, but $262,000,000, $2,000,000 less, and you will notice that years afterward there was a decrease in that revenue which is said to have been covered into the Treasury. These things may be explained perhaps; I can see how warrants paid and warrants unpaid may make a difference in the statements; but you cannot explain, as I think, why it is that the internal-revenue receipts have thus decreased. If you take the next year the same thing is true. In 1865 there was a change of nearly $10,000,000, and all of it made in this new table of 1870. Recollect now that the Register went straight along. It is this table of 1870 that makes these changes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the Senator now on internal-revenue receipts?

Mr. DAVIS. I am speaking of internal revenue alone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator, then, be good enough to tell us in what way the expenditures of the Internal Revenue Department were paid down to the year 1865 or 1866; out of what fund?

Mr. DAVIS. Of course out of the general fund of the Government, out of the general Treasury. All the receipts, I understand, were covered in and the expenses paid out on warrants. If that is not so, I should like the Senator to tell me how it is that the reports ran along for six years before this change took place. Did those gentlemen wait five or six years for their money? Were they not paid at the time when the receipts were covered in?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says that he understands that down to 1865 or 1866 the expenses of collecting the internal revenue were paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and so by appropriation of course; but the money must have been in the Treasury that was expended, and all the money collected of course ought to have been covered into the Treasury. Now, if the Senator should discover, on looking at the law, that that was not the way the law provided, and that the expenditures of the Internal-Revenue office were paid by that office and by its various officers over the country out of their collections and the balance accounted for, then he might possibly suspect, with his general sympathy for and belief in honesty in men in general, that a difference might appear by money being reported as it is in the course of business to the Internal-Revenue office as so much collected and afterward when the accounts of expenditures came to be settled by that office a larger sum would be charged against that money collected than the estimates of the Treasury as to what the probable expense would be would have made. When you have taken it over thirty millions of people and over thirty-four States and over two hundred and fifty internal-revenue districts, it would be very easy perhaps—I do not say it is so, the Senator is the one who possesses the inquiring mind; let him look—to find that every dollar of his two millions and every dollar of his ten millions did not arise from any fault in the Treasury Department, from any error in book-keeping or any other error whatever; but it simply being the duty of the internal-revenue collectors to report the money that they had got, and then when their accounts were settled there would be allowed out of that such and such sums as should seem to be lawful and right for their services and expenses, and if a report happened to be made upon the returns of the internal-revenue agents, as it must be, fixing any day, no matter whether the first day of Congress or the first day of the year, the report of all moneys collected would not show and could not show the actual net balance that would finally go into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. I have stated that there were several months between the 30th of June, to the making up of each of these statements from which I have taken the figures, to be reported to Congress. That, in the first place, would be sufficient time to know and see whether or not there were any expenses coming against the revenue that had been paid in; but, were that not so, how is the lapse of six years to be accounted for? This revenue was collected in 1865 and the amount reported to Congress—and it is so reported in each annual report, year after year—at a given sum; but in 1871 it is changed; it is made $10,000,000 less, if that is the amount, or certainly some millions less. I do not understand that process of reduction, nor do I understand the theory of the Senator from Vermont, that the gentlemen who collected the revenue waited five or six or seven or eight years for their pay.

However, Mr. President, I have said much more than I expected to say, but I have been led on by questions. What I desire is to look over the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts, or through the Senator from Massachusetts, by the Treasury Department; to make some comparisons; and at no distant day I will have something to say in that connection.

The Senator from Massachusetts, I understand, has said that he has taken up, item after item, the figures that I submitted in my remarks the other day. He overlooked several, perhaps a dozen, of the different statements wherein I showed that they differed. I take it that he admits all that he has overlooked and passed by and said nothing about. For instance the Army, the Navy, the Indian accounts, and so on. I take it that those he passed by and took no notice of are admitted to have been correctly stated by myself.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not desire by my silence to admit as true anything which the Senator has said. I do not deny the truth of anything he said, except so far as I have denied and explained in the remarks I have submitted to the Senate. But, if there are other matters which have escaped my observation or to which I have not this morning called the attention of the Senate, I by no means admit that what has been said by the Senator from West Virginia is true.

Mr. DAVIS. At least there has been no explanation of a part of the statements I presented. I am not aware of the Senator's reasons for overlooking them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator from West Virginia concludes, I suggest to him whether we had not better pass the resolution and let the debate await the report of the committee. I have no objection for one, certainly, to voting for this resolution. I would not vote for the preamble because I do not think it is true, as I believe when he explores the Treasury Department in all its branches he will find out. Instead of there being anything very wrong, I think it will all turn out to be very right. Therefore I think the best way would be to have the resolution adopted without the preamble, the committee appointed, and let the matter rest until the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I; but I hope the Senator from Ohio does not mean to say that he thinks we ought to have a special committee on this subject. We have a Committee on Finance, of which the Senator himself is chairman, and which contains, I can say without being in the least invidious, as many gentlemen of the opposition who might be supposed to be patriotic enough to wish to discover any wrong, if there be any, as good as there are in this Chamber. Now, if we are in the economic mood, as I understand we are, the idea of spending four or five thousand dollars for a special committee, while the standing committee, with all its organization, all its clerks, and all its powers, is going to excuse itself from this work, I do not agree to. I am in favor of this and of every other investigation that any Senator upon his responsibility, pointing out anything that needs explanation, desires to have; but I am not, for one, in favor, when we have so many standing committees, including all the Senators of this body, of creating special committees which we all know are of great public expense. If there is any ground to suspect that the Finance Committee, composed as it is of gentlemen acquainted with these subjects on both sides of the House, will not do its duty and explore this thing to the very bottom—as was done in respect of the public bond debt and legal-tenders of the United States, &c., a few years ago—then there would be reason for a special committee, or better reason for re-organizing the standing committee; but as it is, I should hope that all sides would agree that the proper committee to make this inquiry is the standing committee that we have for that very purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I must dissent from the suggestion just made by the Senator from Vermont. He supposes that this inquiry, which everybody admits it is proper to make if for no other reason for our own satisfaction and that of the country, ought to be made by the Committee on Finance, and he repeats that both sides are represented on that committee, meaning by that both parties in the Senate. That is very true. The democratic party is very ably represented on that committee; but we have but one member on it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and others. Two.

Mr. THURMAN. We had but one, but now I am told we have two. The two members that we have on that committee have not devoted any particular attention to this subject, as I understand, and I do not see from anything they have said that they have made the subject a study, as has the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] or the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] and I think that those Senators who have devoted time to this business ought to be appointed on the committee to investigate this matter.

As to expense, I cannot see how it entails one dollar more expense to have this matter referred to a special committee than to one of the standing committees. I do not see how it involves us in one dollar of expense that would not be otherwise incurred. If it is necessary to send for persons and papers, the expense of sending for them is precisely the same whether they are sent for by a standing committee or by a special committee. If it is necessary to employ experts or accountants to assist in this business, the expense is precisely the same whether they are employed by a standing committee or a special committee. In my ignorance I cannot see how committing the investigation to a special committee adds to the expense a cent.

I think that it would be unjust or at least impolitic to refer this to the Finance Committee. I think it ought to be referred to a special committee, and those Senators who have devoted considerable time to the consideration of the subject ought to be members of that committee.

Mr. EDUMNDS. I am glad to hear my honorable friend from Ohio admit that the gentlemen in the opposition are ably represented on the Finance Committee, so that, so far as that committee is concerned, it will not be, even with the worst possible suspicions of the honor of the republican members of that committee, a smothering committee. The simple point, then, so far as he is concerned, between a standing committee and this proposed special committee, is that the gentleman who has given the most attention to the subject does not happen to be a member of the Finance Committee. Well, that is a misfortune, or rather it would be a misfortune were it not for the fact, as I must suppose it is a fact, that the Senator who has said the most upon this subject, and has brought these figures to our attention, has stated to us all that he knows upon the subject at present. We have had the benefit of the investigations made by my honorable friend from West Virginia, and he seems to have "petered out," so far as present explorations are concerned. Let us, therefore, take this contribution that he has so manfully made to our stock of knowledge about the management of the Treasury Department and turn it over to our fresh brethren of the democratic party, who may take hold of it with renewed eagerness. No, Mr. President, I must suggest to my friend from Ohio, seriously speaking, that that argument does not appear to me to have any weight at all.

As my friend says, if we are to have experts, they will not be members of the committee in a technical sense. If we are to have an intelligent and business-like examination of the points named by the Senator from West Virginia, then the Finance Committee is quite competent to attend to it; and with some little experience here in regard to expense, I think I can safely say that the expense of every investigation and inquiry made by a special committee is double what it would be were it made by a standing committee. It has to have a clerk and a fresh stenographer and a fresh room, fresh messengers, and ten thousand things. If you will only look at the accounts of the disbursements of the cashier of the Senate for our committees, you will see very readily how the expenses of special committees run up, I do not mean to say wrongfully and improperly, but from the very nature of the case when you get to it, above what the expenses of the standing committees, who have to have all this standing organization, amount to

Therefore, Mr. President, inasmuch as there can be no difference in respect of the urgency and fidelity of this investigation between the standing committee to which the subject properly belongs and a special committee, I, for one, when the proper time comes, shall move to amend the resolution by striking out "special" and inserting "Finance."

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course I am indifferent as to what committee this matter shall be sent; but I am quite sure that when the Senator from West Virginia comes to examine it deliberately he will find that all these discrepancies, as he calls them, will be amply and fully explained. I listened to the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and it was perfectly obvious that in every case he touched the explanation was perfectly satisfactory without going into the necessary details for a fuller explanation. That sometimes the expenses of a particular year may not at the end of that year be shown by the Treasury books is perfectly plain, because there are outstanding Treasury warrants, unsettled accounts chargeable to that fund, and many other things which would explain much larger sums than are shown here by the statements of the Senator from West Virginia.

Then again, the $248,000,000 difference between the statement of the public debt on the Register's books and the Treasury books has been explained over and over again. For two years the accounts of the Register and the accounts of the Secretary's office differed in the important elements of the mode of stating the account. In the years 1869 and 1870, as we all know, the Secretary of the Treasury insisted upon including in the report of the public debt in the annual statement made by him the amount of money on hand and the accruing interest on the bonds of the United States. That was right. It was a very great improvement made by the then Secretary of the Treasury, and for two years, owing to this change, showing a nominal increase of the public debt by adding to it the accrued interest and then deducting from the total the amount of cash on hand, thus presenting the exact condition of the Treasury as a private individual would state his own book account, necessarily the Secretary's statements differed from the Register's account, which only showed the actual public debt outstanding. It was perfectly right for the Secretary to exhibit the statement he did; it was perfectly right for the Register to exhibit the statement he did; and because the Register of the Treasury afterward adopted the same mode of stating the account for and since the year 1871, the discrepancy between the two accounts is not so great. It is well understood and has been commented on in the Senate Chamber over and over again. Now, to require the Committee on Finance to go over these figures, to go over these statements, and explain these matters that we must be familiar with from the nature of our positions, it seems to me, is to require of us a work of supererogation. On the other hand, it may be that the Senator from West Virginia has impressed upon the minds of some persons in the United States of America, his own constituents or some portion of the people, the idea that by some means or other there is an attempt here to alter or change the accounts (because he speaks of alterations and changes in the accounts) for the purpose of throwing some doubt around the correct statement of the public debt or the correct statements of our expenditures. I for one would like to have the Senator from West Virginia detailed to examine this matter himself, as a member of a special committee, and let him satisfy his own mind, with a perfect confidence in his sense of justice that when he explores these figures in all their details, and is satisfied, he will so report to the Senate. Therefore, for one I shall vote for a special committee.

I have no doubt that a committee can be formed of five members, without any expense at all, to perform this duty; and I do not see any reason for sending for persons and papers. It would be wrong to allow any committee to send to the Treasury Department for papers to be brought from the Treasury Department here or anywhere else. Indeed, the committee ought to go to the Treasury Department, right to the offices, to the places where these books and papers are kept, and look at them; and I can say to the Senator that it seems to me that he would have no difficulty in going himself as an individual and seeing these books and figures. I have never had any. I do not understand why he was refused. He might have asked for elaborate documents and been refused; but it seems to me he could go and examine all these documents and papers as a member of the Senate of the United States. That is usually a matter of courtesy. I do not think it necessary, therefore, to give a committee power to send for persons and papers, but a committee can go there with the power of the Senate and examine these books and make out a statement. While I think the Senator will only by the investigation remove some of the doubts he may have on his own mind, in regard to these items, I would much prefer that he should do it than I be called upon to act in the case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask to have the resolution read, so that I can move an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without the preamble.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out "a committee of five be appointed to," and insert "the Committee on Finance."

Mr. BAYARD. I am very sorry that the Senator from Vermont has offered the amendment. In every respect, for every reason, it is much more satisfactory that the matters embraced in this inquiry should be sent to a special committee. The Committee on Finance has already quite enough, both in the importance and great variety of the subjects referred to it, to keep its time constantly occupied. Besides all that, the gentlemen who have examined this question more than others in the body are not members of that committee. I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that it is important that there should be no doubt whatever in regard to the correctness of the public accounts. I am very sure that the best way to strengthen our credit is to have our accounts at all times open to investigation and their correctness sustained by the intelligence and character of every member of a committee to whom the subject was committed. I trust this matter will not go to the Committee on Finance, because from the very composition of that committee the Senate and the country will be aware that the gentlemen who have given this subject the most attention are excluded from the investigation proposed.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that no man would be more prompt than the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to state that the doubts which have been created in his mind by those obvious discrepancies have all been removed by explanation. I am very sure that the present head of the Treasury Department will lend every aid in his power. But, now that the subject has been mooted, I do submit to the Senate that it ought to be settled, and that any investigation that is fairly asked should be liberally accorded, and that the gentlemen who have taken the pains and trouble to present this apparently entangled and unexplained, I will not say inexplicable, condition of accounts are the proper persons in part to whom such an investigation should be confided.

As to the composition of the Committee on Finance, it has, as far as the minority of this body is concerned, as yet a lower ratio than any other committee of the body. It is plain that, when this especial subject has been considered and brought before the Senate as elaborately and intelligently as it has been by the Senator from West Virginia, the exclusion of the mover of such a resolution from taking part in the investigation would be unwise and irregular. I should certainly desire the investigation, and I have no doubt that the investigation would be facilitated by the gentleman in charge of the Treasury Department, who will of course be desirous to learn how these singular or abnormal irregularities which have been stated could have occurred. As yet no good reason has been advanced for them on the other side, and when I say "the other side," I mean in reply; I do not take it to be a question of sides. These accounts are common to us all; the credit of our country is common to us all. The regularity of the accounts belongs as much to one as to the other. We are equally interested in this matter. Therefore, I think, that where such irregularities are alleged, which are to my mind as yet unexplained, they should be inquired into. Why should not an item fixed and passed be recited in the identical amount from one year to another, when the elements composing it have all been reduced in arithmetical precision to a certain sum? Why should that sum arbitrarily be changed and we be told that millions grow unaccountably upon millions? When that is the case it is time, if this arises from an erroneous system of recital or of book-keeping, that, for the credit of the country, it should be changed. Our accounts ought to be; they are meant for the people. They are not meant for skilled accountants alone. They are not meant for gentlemen who have the balances of the Treasury at their fingers' ends. They should be clear, and simple, and explicit, so that any man in this land who can add and subtract and multiply may be able to understand them; and if the system has been faulty in making up or in presenting or in reciting these accounts it should be changed. Everything should be done to give, not only the people of this country, but those who are our creditors elsewhere, complete and absolute confidence in the accounts of our business as published to the world.

I cannot believe that in this there will not be a hearty and a sincere co-operation of every member of the Senate, and I do trust the Senator from Vermont will permit this special committee to be raised for the reasons I have given, and allow those who have taken an interest in this subject, and who are recognized as the peculiarly fitting persons to be intrusted with its consideration, to take part with and become members of the committee. No member of the Committee on Finance has taken this matter much into consideration. There are but two members of the minority on that committee, and neither of them has had these subjects brought before him for his attention half so much as other gentlemen of the body. If I were to-morrow or to-day to be appointed a member of the special committee, I should ask to be excused, from the fact of other occupation and from the fact that other men who had considered the question more carefully were here in the Senate and subject to service upon the committee. The Committee on Finance has its regular business, and that is very abundant already. The honorable Senator who is chairman of that committee certainly knows that he gives his committee full opportunity to perform its duties by frequent meetings, and that its members respond very fairly to his summons. Therefore, as he has expressed his wish, I join him in it, and I trust the honorable Senator from Vermont will permit this resolution to be adopted.

Mr EDMUNDS. The Senator from Delaware has confirmed my conviction in what he has said, that this inquiry ought to be made by the Finance Committee. If there is any prejudice about it, any preconceived opinion, then his own statement of the fact that this ought to be a most impartial investigation should lead us to send it to a committee which has not expressed itself on the points, but the nature of whose organization implies, from year to year, that it must have a general knowledge, as a judge is supposed to have of the law, of the laws relating to the Treasury Department and of its actual operation. They, therefore, with this general knowledge, their peculiar fitness for the station to which they are appointed, implying that they do have it, leads me to believe that of necessity the correct committee is the Committee on Finance. It is their constant business to study the laws regulating the Treasury Department. It is their constant business to know its operations in a general way; I do not mean to descend into details over it; so that that committee is familiar, as a judge is with the law, of all the general means of getting at the truth about this business which are in existence; and of course perfect means are in existence.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is much more suitable, if our object is a fair and impartial and intelligent investigation, that we should send it to that body of men whose special duty it has been to make themselves familiar with the general principles and the general facts that bear upon such a question. There is no need of having a Finance Committee if this, one of its most appropriate subjects of action, is not to be sent to it. We might just as well, when we have a tax bill come in from the other House or a resumption bill or whatever it may be proposed here, have a special committee upon that; and yet nobody would think of it, for the reason that the selection of standing committees is based upon the idea that we are to have committees enough in the Senate, standing all the time, to cover all the subjects of investigation and action which we are called upon to consider. This is confessedly, intrinsically, necessarily one of the very subjects that belong to the cognizance of that committee, and I cannot persuade myself that my honorable friend from Delaware will fail to do his whole duty in that careful and impartial and diligent investigation which is so much to be desired.

But my honorable friend says that the gentlemen in the opposition have not a very large representation upon that committee. My honorable friend also says that this is not a party question in any sense; that we are all equally interested in it, as is perfectly true. It is just as much the interest of the party to which I belong to correct even an error in book-keeping, if there be one, as it is the interest of the gentleman's party. He is quite right about that. The circumstance, therefore, that there are only two gentlemen of his party upon the Finance Committee should not, on his own correct statement of the situation of this question, weigh a single moment in considering to what committee it ought to be sent. If, as I say, we have a standing committee covering these subjects, appointed for the purpose of considering them, then where is the necessity of setting up a special committee to take away from that standing committee a part of the very duties that it ought to perform?

Mr. THURMAN. Although this discussion is becoming perhaps a little tedious, I must say a few words more on the question. It seems to me that we are in danger of coming to a wrong conclusion about it. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the books and accounts of the Treasury Department, particularly with reference to discrepancies and alterations in amounts and figures that have been made in them, especially in the annual statements of the expenditures of the Government, revenue collected, and the public debt contained in said reports; and if any such discrepancies and alterations be found to exist, to report the same and the extent and nature thereof, the years wherein they occur, by what authority made if any, the reasons that induced them, and to report generally such other and further information bearing upon the subject as to them may seem best; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it will be seen by the resolution that this is not necessarily an inquiry to find out whether the public Treasury has been robbed. This is not to be an inquiry into the misconduct of officers. It is founded on certain discrepancies that appear in reports made to the Congress of the United States that have been repeated year after year, that have gone to the public, that have been relied on by the people and by the public creditors, and which are found by comparison with other reports made from the same source to involve discrepancies amounting to several million dollars. I was going to say many millions, for the discrepancy in a single year with reference to the amount of the public debt, the year 1864 I think it is, is $75,000,000. It has properly been said there is no party question about this. The Senator from West Virginia in the speech which he made uttered not one word of party accusation. He criminated nobody; but he called the attention of the Senate to the fact of these discrepancies between these reports. They were matters calculated to strike the mind of any one unacquainted with any explanation that might be made. Now what answer has been given?

It has been said, and first by the Senator from Massachusetts, that if the Senator from West Virginia had called upon the Secretary of the Treasury peradventure all his difficulties would have been removed by an explanation made by that officer. That was intimated at least by the Senator from Massachusetts. Is that any answer at all? Are the official reports made to Congress, upon which the people, the business men of the country, and the public creditors act, so uncertain, so unreliable, that a man has to go to the Treasury Department to find out whether they are correct or not? The Senator from Massachusetts admits in his speech that the records of the Register and the reports of the Register of the Treasury as to the amount of the public debt cannot be relied upon; that they are untrue. The Senator says that in so many words.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not imagine that the honorable Senator from Ohio pretends to misrepresent me.

Mr. THURMAN. I will read the Senator's own words. Then he cannot say that I misrepresent him.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have not admitted, I think, that they were untrue. If I have, it was a slip of the tongue. I admitted that they were based upon a different state of facts, and did not represent the exact condition of the country with reference to the debt.

Mr. THURMAN. I want to use exactly the language of the Senator, and I will read it:

Then, up to 1869, the Register had kept the account of the debt of the United States, as by law he was required to do. No account of it had ever been kept in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in a certain sense, therefore, there were no present checks upon the accounts of the Register.

Now I wish first to stop there a moment and call the attention of he Senate to the admission that up to the year 1869——

Mr. BOUTWELL. The word the Senator from Ohio used was "untrue;" he said that I had admitted that the statements made by the Register were "untrue."

Mr. THURMAN. I will come to that. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the admission that "up to 1869" "there were no present checks" in the Treasury Department; of course he means "upon the accounts of the Register."

To be sure—

The Senator goes on to say—the books of the Department furnished the means by which the statements made by the Register could be substantiated or invalidated, but there were no present means at hand by which the accuracy of the reports made by the Register of the Treasury could be established.

This is what the Senator admits was the state of the Treasury accounts up to 1869. I say, if that is the case, it is time a remedy was provided. Now we will go on further. In a subsequent paragraph of the Senator's speech he says:

Now, then, the business of the Register of the Treasury in reference to the public debt is this: he keeps an account on the credit side of all the issues of obligations by the Government, whether bonds or United States notes, or any other form of evidence of public indebtedness. He keeps also an account upon the debit side of the payments made for the redemption of these various securities; and the difference between the two sides of the ledger shows the amount of the public indebtedness.

That is what the Senator says in regard to the Register's account. Then he goes on to say:

That was the account kept by the Register of the Treasury from the beginning of the Government until now. It is, so far as I know, a true account. It has not come to my knowledge, and it will never, I think, come to the knowledge of the honorable Senator from West Virginia, that those figures have by anybody, either with or without official authority, been changed; but they do not state the exact truth.

That is what I said was the admission of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well. Now I bring the Senator from Ohio to his own statement, that I alleged that the accounts of the Register were untrue. He has read the record of what I did say.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator cannot undertake to cavil about words with me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THURMAN. I said precisely what I say now, and what I intended to say. The Senator seems to be sensitive about this matter. He assumed a peculiar air in the close of his speech toward the Senator from West Virginia, and undertook to deliver a moral lecture in a tone unusual to the Senate of the United States. The Senator will do best to preserve his equilibrium. I did not say that the accounts of the Register were false; I did not say that the Senator from Massachusetts admitted that they were false; but what I did say, and what I offered to read, so that the Senator's exact words might be used, was that "they do not state the exact truth;" and I was going on to state, when the Senator was so quick to jump up and interrupt me——

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator has taken a reasonable time now in making his statement, and I hope I may be pardoned for an observation. It was quite immaterial to me personally, but it was material to the place, whether or not I had admitted that the statements of the Register were untrue. So far from my having admitted anything of that sort, I said—speaking of the account kept by the Register of the Treasury—

It is—

so far as I know, a true account.

That is what I said. I do not wish to discuss words with the honorable Senator from Ohio. I only wish to be relieved from the impression that would be produced by his remark that I admitted that the accounts of the Register of the Treasury were untrue. That they did not in those years state the exact truth as to the amount of the public debt outstanding, I stated to the Senate in various forms; but the accounts, I insisted then, and I insist now, were true.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator had not interrupted me right in the middle of a sentence, he would have found that I would have read his exact words, and that when I said he admitted that the accounts of the Register were not true, if that was my language, I only meant to say that those accounts did not present the true state of the public debt. That is the main question. The rest is all sticking in the bark, like this talk about whether the figures have been changed in the Register's accounts. The main question is this: Are the reports that are made to the Congress of the United States, that are published by our authority, that are sent abroad to this whole country, that are sent to foreign countries, upon which the people rely, upon which Congress relies, upon which the public creditors rely—are these statements as to the amount of the public debt, the amount of our revenue, the amount of our expenditure, to be really relied upon? We are told distinctly that they are not. We are told distinctly by the Senator from Massachusetts, who was so long at the head of the Treasury, that the Register's accounts upon which we have relied up to the year 1870 without alteration or change—I will use his exact language—

Do not state the exact truth.

That is what we are told. For eighty long years, at least, the people, Congress, and the public creditors thought they did state the exact truth. They relied upon the statements; nobody ever doubted the statements; and now we are told that all that time Congress, the people, and the public creditors were under an illusion, for "they do not state the exact truth," and when the Senator from Massachusetts became Secretary of the Treasury he set somebody else to work to find out the truth. I do not blame him for that. It was his duty to do it, if he found that these reports did not state the exact truth; and the result of his investigation is that these reports are far from stating the exact truth. In one single year, for example, in the statement of the public debt there was a discrepancy to the extent of $75,000,000, and it was time to find some "present checks" for the accounts of the Register of the Treasury. It was time to find some means of making true and accurate reports to Congress; and if the Senator from Massachusetts has accomplished that purpose, it will be one of his claims to the public gratitude and one which his countrymen will very freely admit. But, sir, the Senator went on and said: "It is, so far as I know, a true account," &c.; "but they do not state the exact truth." Now I wish the Senate to listen further to what he said:

When large operations were carried on by the Government and loans were making at the rate of many hundred million dollars a year, these accounts of indebtedness of the Government were very far from the actual truth.

That is the statement of the Senator.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator just read the next paragraph?

Mr. THURMAN. I will read the whole sentence; I am not accustomed to garble anything:

But, nevertheless, they contained the means by which any competent person could ascertain what the truth was, and they stand so to-day.

That is to say, when the Government was seeking loans from the citizens of Ohio and was saying the public debt is so much, the public liabilities are so much, the interest to be paid is so much, our revenue is so much, our expenditures are so much, and you can safely subscribe at the highest figure, these facts will justify you and make the creditors secure, then comes the Senator from Massachusetts and says, "Why, Mr. Ohioan, you were a very simple man; those reports upon which you acted were very far from the truth; but if you were a competent man, if you were an expert in book-keeping, if you were a good statistician, if you knew all about the laws that govern the collection and expenditure of the public revenue, if you were a good accountant and book-keeper and familiar with the laws of the Treasury, then, if you had come to the Treasury, you would have found the means there, by investigation, to ascertain"—what? To ascertain whether the official reports of the Government in regard to the public debt were true or were "very far from the truth." That is what the Senator from Massachusetts tells us. That is the admission that he makes; and if there were nothing else in all this case, I say that he has demonstrated by his speech the necessity of an inquiry whether there is no better means of keeping the books of that Department, so that reports shall not be made to Congress which are very far from the truth and which we see in a single year were $75,000,000 from the truth in the single item of the public debt.

Now, Mr. President, it is not a question whether or not a most expert accountant could go into the Treasury and with sufficient aid find out, with the means which are there, what the state of the public debt is. The question is, is there no mode of keeping the accounts of the Treasury so that the public can know through the official reports what is the amount of public debt, what is the amount of public expenditure, what is the amount of public revenue, so that we can understand all these subjects? We all know that Congress acts upon these reports from year to year. We make them the basis of our legislation. The people act upon them, the public creditors act upon them, and it is high time that the inquiry is made, is there no system of book-keeping by which the reports made to Congress in regard to the revenues of the Government, the expenditures of the Government, and the public debt of the Government can be absolutely relied upon? That is the main question. I say that the thanks of the Senate and the country are due to the Senator from West Virginia for calling our attention to this subject, not in a partisan spirit at all, but in the spirit of a business man, in the spirit of a Senator anxious to protect and promote, and not to injure, much less to destroy, the public credit. Not a word was said by him or by any other Senator who has spoken on this resolution calculated to destroy or to impair the public credit. Every one has hoped that there is an explanation of this business, but every one can see that unless there shall be an explanation and unless some system shall be adopted that in the future shall render such explanations unnecessary, shall remove such discrepancies, shall assure the public that the reports made to Congress can be relied upon—unless something of that kind shall be done the public credit will suffer damage; it will be impaired.

I say again, as has been said, that this is no party question. There is nothing of party in it. It was not inaugurated, I believe, in any spirit of party. It was not inaugurated to criminate anybody at all. It was inaugurated for the legitimate purpose, for the true and loyal purpose, of ascertaining whether or no the accounts of the Treasury cannot be kept as well as the accounts of a great railroad company or of a great mercantile firm. They ought to be kept in a better way. I do not say that anybody is to blame, or who is to blame for it, but it is a fair subject of inquiry, to say the least. I have heard things stated, but I will not repeat them, because I will not repeat things upon mere rumor. I do not expect in this investigation, probably, to implicate anybody. I do not know any such thing as that. I have no such object as that to be promoted. What I want is that some system shall be devised, if it can be, (and, if it cannot be, let us know the fact,) by which we can know whether the reports made to us are the truth, for, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, they are very far from the truth.

One word more, sir, as to the committee to whom this shall go. Certainly no one has more confidence than I have in the Finance Committee; but for the reasons stated by the chairman of that committee and by the Senator from Delaware and reasons stated by others, it does seem to me it is but fair and right that this should go to a special committee. I do not believe that will involve any additional expense. None has been suggested that I know of except the expense of a clerk and stenographer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggested to my honorable friend, or I will now suggest if he is referring to me, that this is one of the essential and appropriate duties of the Finance Committee and belongs to them.

Mr. THURMAN. I was going to notice that. Certainly it would be a very appropriate duty of that committee. I do not deny that. That committee would be a very appropriate committee to make the examination if it had nothing else to do, if it had plenty of time to do it, and if there is no better mode of making the investigation; but it is not necessarily the business of standing committees to make investigations at all. We often raise special committees for that purpose if there is any reason, and I admit there ought to be some special reason why a special committee should be raised. If there is a good reason in this instance, then the resolution as originally proposed ought to prevail. I think there is. I think there is in the fact that has been stated. I think there is in the examination that two of the Senators on this floor have given to this subject, not with any prejudices, not to establish any theory, but merely to arrive at the truth. I think they ought to be on the committee, and then Mr. President can compose it as he pleases and put three members of the Finance Committee upon this special committee, if he will, so that that committee will have all the benefit of the learning and experience of the Finance Committee on the subject of the Treasury Department.

Mr. President and Senators, I have taken up more of your time than I ought to have done in speaking on this subject. I felt that it was misunderstood, that it was looked upon as a party attempt; at least some Senators seemed to think so. I know of nothing of that kind in respect to it, and I think that it was offered in perfect good faith, and it ought to be voted for in the same way.

Mr. MORTON. I am very glad to hear my friend from Ohio disclaim any party purpose or intention in this proposed investigation, for if he had not done so, and the debate should progress much longer, I am very much afraid that impression would prevail. I think this investigation ought to be made, and I am of the opinion that there is more material at present for an impassioned speech than there will be after the investigation is made. I think that this investigation ought to be made by the Finance Committee if a fair and honest report is what is desired, and I have no doubt that that is what is desired by my friend from West Virginia. Many of the members of the Finance Committee have been on that committee for years, and it has been made their special duty to become familiar not only with the general character but with the details of the business of the Treasury Department. It is a very complicated machine, and it will take any committee some time, perhaps weeks, to acquire the preliminary knowledge of the general working of that Department, as to the modes in which the accounts are kept, which the Finance Committee have already obtained by years of experience. Therefore, it ought to be intrusted to a committee that has a general familiarity and acquaintance with the Treasury Department.

What advantage is there in having it go to a special committee? What can a special committee do that the Finance Committee cannot do? Will it be more energetic? Will it be more determined? The Senator from Ohio himself expresses his perfect confidence in the Finance Committee. But he says three members of the Finance Committee can be appointed on the special committee. If the special committee is to be made up in that way, then what is the advantage of having a special committee over the Finance Committee? If the members of the Finance Committee have not the time to attend to it, how much more time will they have if placed on the special committee?

In any point of view the argument is against a special committee. This investigation ought to be left with that committee which by its nature and by its long experience is best qualified to make the examination and to make a fair and honest report. As I said before, the Treasury Department is a complicated machine. If I were appointed on a special committee to investigate it I think it would take me a long time to make myself acquainted with the general machinery of the Treasury Department and the way in which accounts are kept and rendered from time to time, and at the end of two or three weeks' study I would only be where the Finance Committee are at the beginning. I am inclined to think that my friend from West Virginia, with all his knowledge of business and of accounts—and I have no doubt that he is a good business man—will find in the end that some of the difficulties in his mind arise from the fact that he is not familiar with the manner in which accounts are kept in the Treasury Department. This regular committee, the Finance Committee, will, I have no doubt, avail itself of the investigations made by my friend from West Virginia, and he will not only be permitted to go before the committee and give any information he may have or give any direction of examination, but the committee will be glad to have him do so, and he will have every opportunity that he would have if he were on the committee himself. For that reason, because of a desire for a full and fair examination by the committee best qualified to make it, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, as I have been alluded to by my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] as having made some investigation in regard to the accounts in the Treasury Department it is not improper that I should say that last summer I discovered not seeming but absolute discrepancies in the accounts. I gave a great deal of attention to the matter. I called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, as I thought I ought to do, before the holidays, and said to him that there were discrepancies in the accounts sent to Congress and the people. He said he would examine into the matter and talk to me about it when I returned from home after the holidays. Upon getting back here the Senator from West Virginia, who had also gone into an examination of this subject, proposed to offer certain resolutions, and therefore I did not see the Secretary of the Treasury again in relation to the matter.

In my judgment, Mr. President, this investigation ought to be intrusted to a special committee. As a business man, as a man having some knowledge of accounts, I undertake to say that here are months of labor. Can the Finance Committee perform that labor? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is a skilled financier, I doubt not; but can he devote his attention to this matter and abandon the business of his committee? In my judgment he cannot do it. If a special committee shall be raised I ask that I may not be placed upon that committee. For certain reasons I should decline any position there under any circumstances. But still I say it should be a special committee, because the Finance Committee has in charge all the financial interests of this people and cannot give their attention to this business. I have devoted a month's time to the matter myself, and I undertake to say here that the explanation, or the pretended explanation, of the Senator from Massachusetts is not an explanation. He does not undertake to explain the difference of $100,000,000 in one year. I know he can explain the difference of two and a half millions; but this he cannot. I cannot do it. There is no explanation that I can see to be offered, and yet there may be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator what year he refers to?

Mr. EATON. I do not quite remember; 1869, perhaps.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I can explain that.

Mr. EATON. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts has made it so plain that no further explanation is necessary. The old form of making the statement of the public debt was simply to put down the amount of principal of the public debt and carry it out and add it up. I sent a moment ago to the Secretary to have a statement of the year 1868 brought to me, and I have it here. In 1869, when the Senator from Massachusetts became Secretary of the Treasury, he adopted a new form of statement of the public debt which has since been followed by the Department; and that statement contains not only what the former did, but the interest computed up to the day the statement is made for all items of public debt. Then, adding these together, he deducts the amount of money on hand, which at that time was a balance of one hundred to two hundred million dollars, as was stated a moment ago. The difference, therefore, is between these two statements, and it is still preserved. The Register made up his statement in 1869 and 1870 from his books showing the principal of the public debt, just as was done in all time past; but the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury would show it nearly $100,000,000 less, because from the amount of public debt to which he would add the accrued interest there would be deducted the amount of gold and currency on hand. That is the explanation of the statement in 1869 and 1870. In 1871, however, the Register adopted the same plan of stating the public debt as was adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that removed this discrepancy. Now, that is all there is of it in those two years. If I had the statements before me I could point it out fully. There would always be some discrepancy between these two statements, but the statements for those two years explain the way it occurred. Perhaps I have not been more fortunate than the Senator from Massachusetts in making myself clear to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. I understand perfectly the explanation extended by the Senator from Ohio; but it is not an explanation. Let me show the Senator from Ohio in one moment how false his theory is. He says that the cash on hand, which was $150,000,000, is deducted. It cannot be so, for it is not $150,000,000; it is $99,000,000; and that statement of the gentleman shows that he has not made a thorough examination. I have made this observation myself from figures to which the Senator from Ohio refers, and he is incorrect, in my judgment.

That is not all. In my judgment this committee, whether it be the Finance Committee or a special committee, if the committee does its duty, will find that the interest account of the Government is not right. I have been through the figures with regard to the interest account of the Government, and, if this matter goes to that committee, I commend the examination of the interest account of the Government to that committee. I do not undertake to say that there has been fraud here, but I do undertake to say that there are errors.

Again, the best and most expert accountants in this land cannot take the reports of the Treasury Department, their monthly reports, the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, the reports of the Register of the Treasury, and come within fifty millions of the amount of the public debt. They do not agree. No two accounts of the Government agree.

This examination is to be had. It is not to be laughed down. The telling of a story here will not stop examination into the Treasury accounts of the Government. That examination is to be had. There are gross errors, in my judgment. I hope I am wrong; I believe I am right.

Now, I should like to know by what process of book-keeping—I should be very glad to know, whether it be by single-entry or double-entry—you subtract from the public debt of the country the cash on hand. Suppose I owe $100,000, and have my property mortgaged for $100,000, in ten notes of $10,000 each, but I have $5,000 cash on hand. What has that to do with my indebtedness? I owe $100,000. What has the $5,000 cash I have to do with my indebtedness? The public indebtedness of the country ought to be found out without subtracting the cash on hand in the Treasury. In the first place, what is that cash on hand? It is greenbacks; it is coin; it is national-bank notes. It may be called out to-morrow. Appropriations are made by the Congress of the United States that will reduce in one day the $150,000,000 of cash on hand to $50,000,000 of cash on hand. Is that the way, do you mean to say, that the people of the country ought to be told what the general indebtedness of the country is?

My friend from Vermont asked my friend from West Virginia what double-entry book-keeping was. Well, it is not that sort of book-keeping that the Treasury Department adopts. Theirs is single-entry. There is no general stock account, as there must be a general account in double-entry book-keeping where the debit and credit can be shown every day. There is no such thing. It is not done. I am not about to say that it ought not to be done, but it is not done in the Treasury Department. Theirs is a system of single entries, and a system under which the people of this country cannot take the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Register of the Treasury and arrive at the debt of the Government within $50,000,000. There is not a Senator upon this floor who can take the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and arrive at the absolute amount of the public debt within $50,000,000. The present Secretary of the Treasury reports that there has been a diminution of the public debt in the last two years of $20,000,000 in round numbers. Make a thorough examination of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury which I hold in my hand, and you will find that the reduction of the public debt in that time is $5,907,557.88. Those are my figures. I think the Secretary of the Treasury is entirely wrong in his last report, and it is because he manipulates the cash on hand that he arrives at the twenty millions of which he speaks. There is something to look at here. The people ought to know what the condition of their monetary affairs is.

I do not wish to go into any lengthy argument on this subject now. I remember a remark which was made by some Senator on the other side—I think it was the Senator from Indiana—that the speeches had better be made now rather than after the report of the committee. I think not. Let the committee examine thoroughly; let the committee report to this body; and then if our views are wrong we shall rejoice, and no speech need be made.

I hope, Mr. President, that a special committee will be raised. I hope so because I have given so much attention to this matter that in my judgment the general committee of this body on finance have not the time to devote to it. No matter whether I be right or wrong in my views, no matter how erroneous my opinion may be with regard to the condition of the accounts of the Treasury, an examination will take a great deal of time. It is not to be done in a day, or a week, or a month. It will take a great deal of time. Therefore I think it should go to a special committee.

I do not care to detain the Senate any longer upon this matter at this time. I trust that the motion of the Senator from Vermont will not obtain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As this debate is going on I will now make a motion which I hope will be agreeable to everybody, and that is that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS. One minute before that, if the Senator from Vermont will give way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS. Several Senators, especially my friend from Ohio, the chairman of the Finance Committee, have said to-day, as the Senator from Massachusetts did the other day, that I ought to have gone to the Treasury Depar ment to have the discrepancies, or alterations, or changes in the statement explained. Now I want to say to Senators that I did go to the Treasury Department more than once, and I sought everbody there who I supposed could give me information; and to this time we have not——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be just as agreeable to him to go on in the morning, as it is getting late.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not want to make a speech, but only to say a few words in explanation. I did go to the Treasury Department to seek information, and it seems that the Senator from Massachusetts has gone to the Treasury Department and sought information and he has got it in writing; but the Senate will bear me out that only a portion, if any, of the changes that I submitted in my remarks has been touched upon by the Senator from Massachusetts; and I say now, as I understand from the Treasury Department, they cannot explain them, nor have they done so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That which you and your competitor may agree upon and present to the clerk.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at fifteen minutes before one o'clock, and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, beginning with the Committee on the Judiciary.

TERM OF PRESIDENT.

Mr. KNOTT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House No. 2, entitled "A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution," have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the same back with a substitute (H. R. No. 41) and move that the substitute be printed, and that the bill be made a special order for Tuesday next after the morning hour.

The substitute was read, as follows:

ARTICLE XVI.

No person who has held or may hereafter hold the office of President shall ever again be eligible to said office.

Mr. FRYE. I was instructed by the minority of the committee, with the consent of the committee, to offer a substitute for that report from the committee. I have not, by reason of the absence of one of the minority, prepared that substitute. I will ask consent to offer it at the time this report of the committee may come before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ask also that it be printed before that time.

Mr. FRYE. And that it be printed as soon as ready.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] to make this joint resolution a special order for Tuesday next after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. And from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. I object to that.

Mr. RANDALL. It will be necessary to have some discussion upon the subject, and if the gentleman objects to its being considered from day to day until disposed of, that may cut off discussion.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on the Judiciary is entitled to their two hours.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to make it a special order for Tuesday next after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. ASHE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 626) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to naturalization, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, required by section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may be made by an alien before the clerk of any of the courts named in said section, and that all such declarations heretofore made before any such clerks shall be legal and valid as if made before one of the courts named in said section.

Mr. ASHE. I will now move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to hear some explanation of the provisions of this bill. In what way does it propose to amend the Revised Statutes?

Mr. ASHE. In this particular: It authorizes an alien to file his declaration before a clerk of any of the courts named in the section of the Revised Statutes referred to. Before the adoption of the Revised Statutes that was the law, but in the revision of the statutes the word "clerk" was omitted. A number of immigrants in the Northwestern States especially, supposing there had been no change in the law, have filed their declarations before the clerks of the courts. This bill is simply to put back the law to where it was before the revision of the statutes was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether this bill goes to the extent of curing the defect in the declarations already made?

Mr. ASHE. Yes, sir; it cures all such defects.

Mr. PAGE. If that is the only change proposed by this amendatory bill, I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will regard the previous question as unnecessary.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. HUNTON. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 353) to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes, have unanimously directed me to report back the same with an amendment, and recommend its passage.

The bill, with the amendment of the committee proposing to insert the word "and," provides that section 1911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by inserting the words "and the laws of the United States" after the word "Constitution" in the latter clause of said section.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say a word in explanation of this bill. The section which it proposes to amend confers upon the district courts of Washington Territory jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the Territory.

The design of the amendment is to give jurisdiction to those courts in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the Territory, thus conforming the law in regard to Washington Territory to the laws originally adopted in regard to Kansas and Nebraska.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does this bill make the same provision for the other Territories that it does for Washington Territory?

Mr. HUNTON. So far as I know, Washington is the only Territory in this condition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have had some occasion recently to look into this question, and I find an anomaly in the law. In the Territory of Washington a case can be taken up to the Supreme Court from the highest courts there, if the sum in controversy amounts to $2,000, or if the laws or Constitution of the United States are drawn in question. But the same provision does not apply to any other Territory. In the other Territories there must be either a money consideration to the amount named, or a personal right under the writ of habeas corpus must be involved. Thus a whole class of cases of vital importance, involving perhaps the construction of the very organic law of the Territories, cannot be taken up to the Supreme Court. If this bill conforms the law as to all the Territories to that proposed in regard to Washington Territory, it certainly ought to pass. I hope this amendatory bill is broad enough to do that.

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; the bill under consideration applies only to Washington Territory, the Territory referred to in section 1911 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. The provision ought to be general; there is no reason why Washington Territory should have this exceptional privilege over all the other Territories.

Mr. HUNTON. Section 1911, which it is proposed to amend, applies to Washington Territory alone. That being the section to be amended, we can only make the amendment apply to that section.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the same provision ought to apply to all the Territories.

Mr. HUNTON. I suggest, then, that the gentleman introduce a bill to that effect and have it referred to the committee.

Mr. JACOBS. I would like to make a statement in regard to the condition of the laws of Washington Territory. The ninth section of the organic act, which relates especially to the judiciary, gives the district courts of the Territory jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the Territory, thus corresponding with the jurisdiction given to the circuit and district courts of the United States. In section 1909 of the Revised Statutes, all the Territories of the United States are enumerated with the exception of Washington Territory, and the cases in which an appeal or writ of error from the Supreme Court of those Territories will lie are defined. In section 1910 of the Revised Statutes the jurisdiction of the district courts of those Territories is stated, it being declared that the district courts of those Territories shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States and of said Territories. Then section 1911, for the amendment of which I have introduced this bill, refers to the jurisdiction of the courts of Washington Territory and declares that the district courts shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of said Territory, thus leaving it a very grave and doubtful question whether the district courts of Washington Territory have jurisdiction over cases arising under the laws of the United States.

The repealing clause in section 5596 seems to draw two distinctions, that the incorporation into said revision of any general and permanent provision taken from an act making appropriations, or from an act containing other provisions of a private, local, or temporary character, shall not repeal or in any way affect any appropriation or any provision of a private, local, or temporary character contained in any of said acts, but the same shall remain in force. That cannot be said of the laws of a Territory or the organic act of a Territory, especially those provisions which pertain to its judiciary, which are otherwise local and temporary. Hence, as the law stands at the present time, it is a doubtful question whether the district courts of the Territory have jurisdiction over cases arising under the laws of the United States. I wish to have this thing fully understood, because it is a matter of the first importance in that Territory. In nearly every case in which the United States has been a party the objection has been raised in our courts that the district courts of the Territory have no jurisdiction.

Mr. HUNTON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let me point out to the gentleman before he demands the previous question that he has dropped a word which is absolutely necessary to the sense of his bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman refer to the word "and?"

Mr. HURLBUT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the word "and" will be inserted. It is a mere clerical omission.

Mr. HUNTON. I have written the word "and" in the bill reported back.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the word "and" will be inserted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF ABANDONED PROPERTY, ETC.

Mr. ASHE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 53) to amend the third section of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," reported the same back with a substitute.

The SPEAKER. Unless objection be made the Chair will direct the substitute alone to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to amend section 1069 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to claims for abandoned property.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That section 1069 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, so amended that jurisdiction shall be taken and exercised by the Court of Claims over the claims of all persons who were infants, married women, idiots, lunatics, insane persons, or persons beyond the seas at the time of the seizure of any abandoned or captured property: Provided, That said claims are already filed in said court or may be filed within a period of two years from the passage of this act.

Mr. ASHE. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I make the point of order that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under Rule 112, as it will require appropriations to be made to pay the judgments to be rendered under it if it should become a law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER in the chair.) The point of order is well taken; and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT ERWIN.

Mr. CAULFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Court of Claims may take jurisdiction of the claims of Robert Erwin, of Savannah, Georgia, for property taken from him, which claims were by accident or mistake of his agent not filed in season to save the term of limitation, without fault or neglect on his part.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that that bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken; and the bill will be so referred.

STAMPING OF UNSTAMPED INSTRUMENTS.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 785) to extend the time for stamping unstamped instruments, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the stamping of unstamped instruments, documents, or papers," approved 23d of June, 1874, shall be extended to the 1st day of January, 1877.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. FRYE. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1054) to extend the time for claimants under section 11, chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, to prove their claims. I wish to state that this bill was reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] on Friday, and was ordered to be printed and recommitted. In the absence, the necessary absence of that gentleman, I have been requested by the committee to bring it back to the House and to ask its passage.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall be the duty of the court of commissioners for the Alabama claims to receive, examine, and pass upon all claims that may be admissible under the provisions of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, which may be presented and filed within three months after this act shall take effect; provided that it shall appear by the claimants' petition that, by reason of the absence of the claimants from the United States, or their ignorance of the time limited for the filing of petitions by such claimants, or for other reasons satisfactory to the court, such claims have not been previously presented to said court within the time limited by said act; and such claims, in cases where the claimants shall be absent from the United States at the time of presenting the petition, may be presented and verified by the attorney-in-fact of such claimants; and their evidence, in support of their respective claims, may be taken, if abroad, before any officer authorized to administer an oath by the authorities of the country where they reside, to be authenticated in due form of law.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say but a word or two in explanation of this bill. It does not extend the jurisdiction of the court over any new matter whatever. The old law provided that all claims should be filed within six months from the approval of the law. Now all of the large claimants, the merchants and the ship-owners, filed within the six months their claims, and all parties who had employed attorneys to look after their interests filed their claims. But it has been found that some few sailors on the Pacific coast, and some few sailors on the Massachusetts coast, whalemen, and perhaps a few others elsewhere, ignorant of the law or absent from home, failed to file their claims within the six months. As nearly as can be ascertained, these claims do not in all amount to $200,000. The claimants are of the poorer class, the class who need help, if any one does; and it was thought unanimously by the committee that it would be highly proper and just that those men should have an opportunity to appear before that court.

Mr. MOREY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I will hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following sections:

SEC. —. That the following words, at the end of the twelfth section of the act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys paid into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," approved June 23d, 1874, to wit: "nor arising in favor of any person who did not at all times during the late rebellion bear true allegiance to the United States," be, and the same are hereby, stricken out and repealed; and the court of commissioners of Alabama claims are hereby authorized and empowered to hear and determine upon all claims presented and falling within the provisions of said act whenever it shall be shown that at the time of the loss the claimant was entitled to the protection of the United States in the premises.

SEC. —. That the time for filing claims in said court is hereby extended to the 1st day of September, 1876.

Mr. FRYE. I do not admit the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.) The amendment is not before the House.

Mr. MOREY. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me two or three minutes, that I may explain what I have in view in offering this amendment?

Mr. FRYE. I desire that an amendment so important as that shall be considered by the Judiciary Committee before it is considered by the House. I therefore refuse to admit it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. This resolution changes the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The resolution is not now in order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is not this in the nature of a bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in the nature of a bill. Has there been any paper or petition referred to the committee on which such a resolution can be based?

Mr. TUCKER. While the Committee on Ways and Means favor this bill they have considered that its consideration would more properly belong to the Committee on the Judiciary, and therefore they report it back with the recommendation that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back House bill No. 55, directing the commissioners in charge of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company to institute suits against the agents of said company with a view of holding them personally responsible to the depositors for deposits made to said company, with the recommendation that it be referred to the special committee on that investigation. I move that it be referred to the committee of which Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS, of Virginia, is chairman.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee on Claims have examined sundry petitions, memorials, and bills, and they find them improperly referred. The Clerk read the petitions and bills, as follows:

"We are in favor of—

"1. The immediate repeal of the 'forced' resumption act, desiring to reach specie payments naturally, by reviving and building up the business and industries of the country.

"2. Retiring the currency of private corporations as soon as it can be conveniently done and the substituting greenbacks therefor.

"3. A legal-tender currency commensurate with the business interests of the country, and interchangeable at par with 3.65 United States bonds.

"4. Equal and just legislation and action by the Government, sustaining, and not discrediting, the currency of the people.

"5. The payment of all debts, public and private, in good faith, according to the contract."

Mr. PATTERSON also presented a memorial from the constitutional convention of the Territory of Colorado, asking for an appropriation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON. I also ask that the memorial may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the convention assembled for the purpose of framing a constitution for the State of Colorado respectfully represents: That under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved March 3, A. D. 1875, entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government," &c., the members of this convention were elected and have duly assembled at Denver, in said Territory, and are now engaged in the work for which they were so elected under said act; that said act fixed the number of representatives, and it was and is out of the power of said Territory to diminish said number or provide any other mode of framing such constitution than that specified in said law; that by an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, the following sums and no more were appropriated for the legitimate expenses of said Territory, to wit: For per diem and mileage of members and per diem of officers, $13,000; for printing, $4,000; for rent of halls and rooms, $600; for fuel, lights, labor, and incidentals, $1,800; total, $19,400: which amount is all that now remains in the hands of the territorial secretary for the payment of the legislative expenses, all prior appropriations for that purpose having been exhausted; that said amount is barely sufficient to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly now about to convene, leaving no funds which can be applied to the purpose of defraying the expenses of this convention; so that this body is now sitting without any means whatever of meeting even ordinary contingent expenses, to say nothing of the compensation of its members and officers, while the convention has no power in any way to raise funds for any purpose.

Your memorialists further show that the Territory of Colorado is of great extent, embracing more than one hundred and five thousand square miles, being over three hundred miles from north to south and near four hundred miles from east to west, traversed by numerous ranges of snow-covered mountains, many of them passable only at widely-separated points, so that many of the members are obliged to travel from four hundred to ten hundred and sixty miles, crossing several ranges of mountains at the line of perpetual snow in coming to and returning from this convention; while the labor and expense of such journeys are enhanced to more than fourfold that which would attend journeys of like distance in the older States by reason of the want of suitable means of conveyance through such wide and unimproved regions. At the same time, the great extent of territory and the diverse character of the productions and industries of the different portions thereof give rise to varied and complicated interests which must be of viral importance in the future, and which should be cared for now, or the welfare of the great State we purpose to establish will be seriously jeopardized. On this account this convention is called upon to exercise great deliberation in its work, which must be thoroughly done in order to effect the intention of the law of your honorable body which called us to act in this responsible capacity. As this convention is wholly the creation of the Congress of the United States, and is now engaged in carrying out in part the wise purposes of the National Government in building up free and self-supporting States in this great central region of the continent, your memorialists feel they may justly expect that the request herein made will be readily granted.

In consideration of the premises and in view of the important and complicated interests confided to this convention, and of the length of time it may require to complete the work with which it is charged by the act aforesaid, your memorialists pray that your honorable body will enact a law appropriating the sum of $40,000 as an addition to the legislative appropriation for this Territory for the purpose of defraying the expenses of this convention.

Done in convention this 6th day of January, A. D. 1876.

J. C. WILSON,
President.

Mr. STEELE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1335) to declare the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, open to exploration and settlement, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1337) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WOOD, of New York, in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Centennial appropriation bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that any argument is needed to secure the passage of this bill; but, inasmuch as I am, to some extent, intrusted with its advocacy, I beg leave to submit some of the reasons which I think not only justify but imperatively demand the granting of this appropriation.

Our aid is invoked in behalf of an international exhibition conceived by patriotic men as a fit way to commemorate the first centenary of American Independence. This undertaking was commenced when the busy hum of cheerful industry echoed throughout the land, when wealth and prosperity abounded in the North, and returning cheerfulness illumed the hitherto desolate South. But the storm of 1873 which swept over the country left its pathway black with general ruin and universal gloom. The wheels of industry stood still, trade became lifeless, the human energies were palsied because confidence and hope were crushed. From that day until this there has been no break in the overhanging clouds. The enterprise under consideration, begun under such happy auspices, could not escape the mildew which blighted all things. Under adverse circumstances its officers and managers have struggled on with unflagging zeal, untiring energy, and recognized discretion and ability, to complete the original designs in a manner worthy of the grand event. The treasury of the commission is almost empty; individual effort has been exhausted; the centennial year has already dawned; but a few months remain until the exposition should be opened, and yet the buildings are not completed. In this extremity the Government is asked to lend its helping hand to save the undertaking from failure and the country from disgrace.

If it can be shown that the national honor is involved in the success of this exhibition, I apprehend all opposition will be silenced and this bill will receive a unanimous and cordial support. Surely, no gentleman upon this floor would stop to calculate the cost of preserving the good name of his country. Millions of money have been promptly voted, and lives, of far more value than all those millions, have been freely given in various wars to preserve the dignity and integrity of the nation; and there can be no extremity of financial distress which will cause a Congress of the United States to falter in appropriating money to save the Government from reproach. National unity is valueless without national honor. Would it not be better that these States should be dismembered, that this great and beautiful fabric of government should crumble into utter and irretrievable ruin, than the Union should be preserved unbroken and be subject to the well-deserved sneers of sister-nations? Are we liable to stand dishonored before the world by the failure of the centennial exposition? To answer that question we must examine the history of the enterprise.

The first legislative act relative to this exhibition was passed March 3, 1871, and from the title to the concluding section the General Government is recognized as its sponsor and the guarantor of its success. The act is entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania in the year 1876."

Here the object and the method are clearly indicated. The object is national, the mode of celebrating it is international. No act of Congress was needed to cause a spontaneous outburst of patriotic enthusiasm upon the part of American citizens during this eventful year. But in the exuberance of our pride we wanted all the nations of the world to come and compare their products and their progress with ours, and then go home filled with amazement and admiration. That seems to be the spirit which pervades this act. The very nature of the contemplated celebration made it subject to governmental control and entitled to Government aid.

The first section of the act provides—

That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

Here again the international character of the celebration appears; and it is distinctly stated under whose auspices it will take place.

Section 2 provides for commissioners "to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition."

Section 3, 4, and 5 provide that these commissioners "shall be appointed by the President of the United States, and shall hold their meetings in the city of Philadelphia."

Section 6 enacts that this commission shall report to Congress, among other things, "a plan or plans of buildings" for the exhibition. Here then we have a commission created by Congress, required to report to Congress, appointed by the President, and charged with the duty of preparing buildings and regulations for the reception and exhibition of foreign as well as domestic products. In addition to all this, the President is directed to notify all nations of the time and place for holding the exhibition.

It seems to me that it would be impossible to frame a statute whereby the United States Government could be more fully identified with and made responsible for any enterprise than is done by the language of this act.

Nor is its force weakened by the only section to which I have not yet referred. It is therein provided—with amazing inconsistency—that "the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition or by reason of the same." This act, in a spirit of exultation which was natural and proper, had declared in its preamble that "it behooves the people of the United States to celebrate, by appropriate ceremonies, the centennial anniversary of this memorable and decisive event which constituted the 4th day of July, A. D. 1776, the birthday of the nation;" and, having determined what would be a fitting celebration of the great event, having appointed agents to prepare a world's fair, and having secured to the Government exclusive control thereof, it reaches this feeble and petty anticlimax that the Government shall bear none of the burden. All of the glory, but none of the expense! A national anniversary to be celebrated within our borders by all the nations of the earth, and this great Government inaugurating and controlling it, and yet refusing to contribute to the necessary expense! The spectacle is indeed humiliating.

Following up the history of this celebration, we find an act relative to the centennial international exhibition was passed on June 1, 1872, by which a board of finance was incorporated. The Secretary of the United States Treasury was required to prepare certificates of stock for this corporation, and counterfeiting these certificates was made a crime of equal enormity with counterfeiting the currency of the United States. This act also requires that reports of the progress of the work, from time to time, shall be made to the President of the United States. Here again we encounter the guardian angel of the Treasury, with drawn sword, declaring that we shall have an international celebration of a national event, but that no money shall be taken from the National Treasury to defray the necessary expense thereof. The Government will sanction this enterprise gotten up for its glory and for its benefit, but not a dollar of its funds shall be expended in the cause. It seems impossible to reconcile such inconsistencies and harmonize such parsimony with a spirit becoming to this great commemoration.

The act of June 5, 1874, contains this same inharmonious provision, which is made utterly nugatory by the context. That act directs the President "to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States."

The international character of the exhibition is again affirmed; the jurisdiction of the General Government over it is again distinctly avowed; provision is made for invitations to foreign powers "in the name of the United States."

Still further, Congress directed that an appropriate medal should be struck at a Government mint for the centennial board of finance. It also provided for the free importation of goods intended to be placed on exhibition.

Mr. Chairman, in view of all this legislation, can Congress escape from the responsibility which it has again and again assumed in regard to this international exhibition? Will the mere declaration of a purpose to withhold pecuniary aid relieve it from the odium which a failure would incur, especially in view of all it has done to encourage and patronize the enterprise and give it a national character at home and abroad?

The success or failure of this exposition would not be so grave a matter if its effects could be confined to our own citizens and their relations to our own Government. But the dignity and honor of the United States among other nations is involved. In July, 1873, the President issued his proclamation that "an international exhibition" would be held, and "in behalf of this Government and people cordially" commended it to all nations. The Secretary of State promptly communicated the proclamation to foreign powers, and conveyed to each one the President's hope that an active interest would be aroused, and that the occasion would be improved by "the interchange of national sentiment and friendly intercourse."

This diplomatic circular and presidential proclamation were construed by some into an invitation, which a number of foreign governments accepted promptly, heartily, and, as one of the greatest and most powerful of them said, "with sincerest thanks." When the more cordial invitation of 1874 went out by authority of Congress it awakened an interest which hitherto had languished; and now thirty-eight foreign governments have declared their purpose of participating in this our national anniversary. Commissioners have been appointed from among their most distinguished men, and several of these governments have made generous appropriations, that they may be creditably represented.

These are nations from all parts of the habitable globe; some of them almost older than history; many of them venerable with the gray of centuries; most of them habituated to and believing in monarchical government; but all coming to do honor to the young Republic. From the Orient and the Occident, from the Arctic and the Antarctic, they will come. But of them all there will be no sublimer spectacle than the presence of Great Britain, with the most amazing and most admirable magnanimity, joining in the celebration of an event which lost her these vast possessions. The benignant mother comes to honor the refractory child and to rejoice in her growth and prosperity. Second only to this will be the presence of the mighty monarchy of Russia, whose august and liberal-minded emperer boldly declares to all the world that he regards the event which we are about to celebrate as "one of the grandest facts in the history of humanity."

All of these thirty-eight nations will come bearing in their hands the "cordial invitation" of the United States. This being so, is not this Government bound by every consideration of hospitality, of honor, and of self-respect to make suitable provision for their entertainment? When they come with their multitudinous products of the soil and mine, with their varied achievements of skilled labor, and with their rare treasures of art, can we in common decency turn them into unfinished and perhaps roofless halls? Imagine, if you please, these foreign nations, whose friendly regards and high respect for the United States prompted them to come, arriving on our shores, and our Government, instead of giving them a cordial and joyous greeting, stands abashed and silent, and points to the uncompleted structures, upon which she has refused to spend a dollar, and thus manifests the pride she feels in her one hundredth anniversary, and her appreciation of the courtesy of foreign powers! I cannot believe that there will be any such sad commentary upon the generous patriotism of this people.

Mr. Chairman, the question has been asked, Where do we derive the power to make this appropriation? I answer by asking, Where did Congress derive the power to embellish and decorate the grounds and buildings of the Government? Where did it derive the power to purchase the works of art which adorn these Halls and add to their attractiveness? Where did it derive the power to purchase the magnificent library of which we boast? Where did it derive the power to fit out expeditions to explore the polar seas and to travel to foreign countries to observe the transit of Venus? Where did it derive the power to appropriate money on three different occasions to promote international exhibitions held in other countries? Where did it derive the power to encourage art, to promote science, to advance practical and useful industry, to maintain an Agricultural Department or a horticultural garden, a National Observatory or a Signal Corps?

I might further answer this question by asking one which was frequently suggested during the recent eventful years of our country's history, and whose most satisfactory answer was found in the patriotic impulses of the people. Many things have been done perhaps not within the strict letter of the Constitution; but we have high authority for saying "The letter killeth, the spirit giveth life." The power which saved a nation's life can save a nation's honor.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not admit there is the slightest doubt about the constitutional power to make this appropriation. I do not propose to go into any extended argument on that point, but I hold in my hand a volume containing the messages of the early Presidents of this country, the fathers and founders of the Republic, the men whose great brains conceived and whose hands draughted this Constitution and transmitted it to us as the most priceless legacy they could leave to posterity. These men were familiar with the powers delegated to Congress and the extent and scope of those powers, and yet we find that Washington, who presided over the Constitutional Convention, Madison, who of all others was most conspicuous in draughting it, and Jefferson, who understood it quite as well as either, all concurred in asking and recommending to Congress appropriations analogous to this. I will not weary the House by quoting any lengthy extracts, but will refer simply to the fact that Washington in his first annual message said:

> I cannot forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement, as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home.

An object which would unquestionably be subserved by holding an international exhibition of foreign as well as of domestic art. Jefferson and Madison, without quoting their language, both recommended the establishment of a national university. As I claim the appropriation asked for in this case is entirely analogous to that, I am content to rest the constitutional question upon such high authority.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot escape our responsibility by attempting to dwarf this celebration into a purely local one. Its character and scope are irrevocably settled. They are beyond our power of control. In the judgment of some the National Capital, and of others the great commercial metropolis of the country, would have been more suitable for holding this exhibition. But there seemed to be a peculiar propriety in celebrating the birthday at the birthplace of the nation. It is too late now to cavil about that. The simple fact with which we are confronted is the result of the success or failure of the enterprise on hand. Will any gentleman pretend that Philadelphia alone will bear the shame of holding a world's fair in unfinished halls? Will any gentleman pretend that the sneers and scorn of disappointed and ill-treated foreign nations will fall on that city only? Philadelphia did not invite them here; they are not her guests. But they will turn with indignant anger to the Government of the United States and say, "We accepted your respectful and cordial invitation; we came here to unite in commemorating your national birthday, and we go home insulted and disgusted with your incivility and inattention?" Who here is prepared to help drag America from the proud position she holds among sister-powers and lay her prostrate in humiliation and shame?

I do not forget, Mr. Chairman, that this Government is groaning under an oppressive debt. But I have already said that its good name is worth infinitely more than accumulated treasures. I go further, and affirm that this appropriation would be a judicious expenditure without any reference to the point of international honor. The universal maintenance of local fairs and industrial institutes is, I think, conclusive evidence of their beneficial effects. For the same reason and to a greater extent the world's fairs manifest their advantages.

The peace society of Great Britain was one of the chief instrumentalities in inaugurating the first great exhibition held in London. The industries of different nations united under one roof for the purpose of comparing the progress which each has made, each teaching something to and learning much from all the others, cannot but inspire mutual respect. And the contributions which each thus makes to the general knowledge give new impetus to science and art, and lift all humanity to a higher plane of civilization. As nations are brought into more intimate intercourse, as they learn to know each other, to respect each other, to engage in friendly and honorable rivalry, the stronger become the bonds of peace, the larger and fuller the measure of individual happiness and of general prosperity.

If this be true of intercourse between nations, how much truer and how much more important are the effects upon people of the same government. In all the wide range of wants and of desires there is nothing so much needed by the people of these United States as mutual sympathy and affection. Nothing can produce these feelings half as well as an intermingling of the people of different sections. Exaggeration and misrepresentation lose their power for mischief when our citizens are brought into frank and friendly intercourse.

There is a story told of a traveler who in the heavy fog of an early morning saw the dim figure of what he supposed to be a dangerous monster. As the mists gradually lifted he saw that it was a man. The sunlight drove away the gloom; he drew nearer, and found it was his brother. So, I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, if we draw nearer to those whom we have not clearly seen through the clouds of prejudice and passion, we will find them to be neither Dukes of Alva nor Spanish inquisitors, but not only men, but brethren. The memorable year upon which we have entered will bring all the sections of this country into close relationship. The very presence of foreigners will make our national family more compact. The necessary comparison of other institutions with ours will warm all hearts with a patriotic enthusiasm. But, more than that, the spirit of '76 will breathe its influence upon our people, and make us feel that we have a common inheritance of glorious memories. Under that influence all animosities, all angry memories, must fade away as an unpleasant and to-be-forgotten dream. That result alone will be worth incalculable millions to this land. The passage of this bill by the aid of those the sincerity of whose patriotism has been unjustly questioned will conduce to that "consummation so devoutly to be wished;" for an appropriation out of the National Treasury in aid of this enterprise will give each individual throughout the country a right to feel a personal interest in the celebration. It then becomes not a celebration of a stock company nor of a city nor of a State alone, but the people's money will have made it the people's cause. And then when the ark of the covenant, amid the universal joy, shall have been set up anew, upon foundations which cannot be shaken, all citizens can kneel around the common altar and renew their vows of fraternal affection.

I rejoice, Mr. Chairman, in the fact this is not and cannot be made a party question. It is a happy thing that there are times in our lives when party walls are broken down and we mingle as fellow-citizens anxious for our country's glory. Most questions presented for legislative action, whether we will it or not, assume a party aspect and draw us by party affiliations. But this one presents no conflict between patriotism and party fealty, but appeals solely to our pride as American citizens.

It is said that when the first ship bearing at its mast-head the Stars and Stripes sailed into the port of Canton, the Chinese flocked to the shores, filled with surprise and delight. They said the flag was as beautiful as a flower, and they called the country which it symbolized the flower-flag country. Mr. Chairman, to them and to all the world who may visit us during this auspicious year let us present the mysterious unfolding and wonderful development of the century plant. And while in our pride we exhibit the many-tinted glories of a hundred years, may there arise from grateful hearts an incense richer in perfume than all the gardens of the world exhale. This can be so, this will be so, if cherishing only our common memories, realizing only our common interests, we march onward with a common hope. Then all the peoples of the earth, beholding the unity, prosperity, fraternity, and happiness of the indivisible Republic, will unite with us, and with equal earnestnessand sincerity, in exclaiming Esto perpetua!

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with very great pleasure for the first time to my friend the chairman of the committee who has just presented his views on this question to the House. The House has heard the argument upon the constitutionality as well as upon the necessity and propriety of this measure. It is not my purpose after his argument to address myself to that part of the question.

It is very well known, Mr. Chairman, to my constituents, to my colleagues upon this floor of the last Congress, and to the friends of this measure everywhere, I believe, that I have been an unwavering supporter of an appropriation to this centennial exhibition ever since it was first proposed. I have spoken for it upon this floor and before my constituents in the last canvass, and they indorsed me. I now rise, sir, to say a few words only in its favor.

Mr. Chairman, if it was supposed that the irritating discussion of the past few days would drive southern men from their support of this measure, I hope, I sincerely trust, that the result of the vote will only add another illustration to the many which we have given of how utterly impossible it is for some people to understand and appreciate the spirit which animates us. We acquit our northern countrymen of all responsibility for that discussion; we know that they did not desire it any more than we did. Understanding fully, seeing through it clearly, (for it was very transparent,) the motive for the introduction of it upon this floor and attaching to that motive its exact value, we simply wish to look down upon and pass by this whole subject. We wish to act in regard to that melancholy chapter in American history as Noah's sons did to him in the hour of his humiliation. We would, sir, with averted looks and backward steps cast the mantle of oblivion over it. We wish the disturbers of the public peace to understand that notwithstanding the spirit exhibited toward us we are too good patriots and too sincere men to allow that spirit either to control us or to serve as an example to us on this occasion. We wish to maintain the honor and character of the American Union, and we will do it if we are allowed to.

Mr. Chairman, there is one element on this floor to which frequent allusions have been made in the recent debate—an element more interested in the result of these discussions than any other upon this floor, and which has not yet been heard from. I mean the soldiers of the South in the late war by whatever title gentlemen may call them, and of whom I am one. They have sat in silence, sir, and taken the fire which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has opened upon them, with no other feeling than that of gratitude for having escaped from so terrible an enemy as he must have been in battle during the late war. [Laughter.] If now, when his hair is silvering and his natural force perceptibly abating, he can develop such an intense and bitter spirit, how must his plume have waved in the forefront of that conflict which was carried on when he was young and strong, and healthy!

This element to which I allude have not yet spoken—they could not be goaded into the discussion. On the contrary, they have exhibited a spirit which the American people, I believe, will not soon forget, that of men who met the storm of hate and persecution as the swan meets the billows, with a breast of down, and who have lifted above its wild discord only the calm voice of peace.

Now, in regard to this appropriation, I wish to say that I know gentlemen upon this floor from my section of the country, who were engaged in the same cause that I was engaged in, who did not intend to vote for this measure until this discussion to which I have alluded occurred, but who are now determined to support it, in order that they may set an example of patriotism which they wish to see followed. I cannot speak for all of them, I have no authority to do so. But now, my friends—and I am talking to you southern men exclusively—I appeal to you, if there are any of you who still oppose this bill, to unite with me in doing an act which can only promote the honor and advance the interests of this country and the peace and happiness of its people.

There is one subject upon which I can speak for them. It is a subject in regard to which they have not always received justice, and I ask the House to listen to my words. This is not the first time I have uttered them either in private or in public. They and I recognize fully, we appreciate to its utmost extent, the fact that in no other country but our own could there be or has there ever been such a sight possible as that of men who, within five years of the time when they were arrayed in battle against a government, have been restored under the beneficence of free institutions not only to the rights of citizenship but to equal representation and participation in the control of that government. They not only fully realize that, they not only appreciate it to its utmost extent, but they have an abiding sense of the sublimity of such a spectacle, and they are proud of their country for having presented that spectacle to the astonished gaze of mankind.

This bill, my friends, to whom I am particularly addressing myself, furnishes you an opportunity to illustrate again and testify in the highest form the desire, the anxious desire which I know possesses you, to aid in every way in your power to advance the material interests, to elevate the character, and to add to the glory and the honor of this Republic. And I again appeal to you, my southern friends, not to miss this opportunity, but take advantage of it.

Now one word in conclusion. I hope I may be pardoned for thanking my honorable friend from Massachusetts in front of me [Mr. BANKS] and my honorable friend from Massachusetts in rear of me [Mr. TARBOX] for the eminently patriotic and statesmanlike speeches which they uttered on this floor a few days ago. I thank them for them as an American citizen. They sounded to my ears like the old voice of Massachusetts in the early days when the southern colonies proclaimed that the "cause of Boston was the cause of all." And I can only say for one that I trust their sentiments may be echoed and re-echoed throughout the borders of this land, from the North to the South, and from the East to the West. And I once more appeal to my southern friends upon this floor, if any of them are disposed to oppose this bill, to wheel into line and do what I believe to be an act of genuine high patriotism, and to vote for this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHEAKLEY,] who desires to move an amendment.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I move to amend the pending bill by adding the following:

Provided, That entrance to the centennial grounds and exhibition shall be free on the 4th day of July, 1876, and also on each and every Thursday during the continuance of the said centennial exposition; and no fee shall be demanded or accepted from any person or persons for the privilege of entering upon and viewing the said centennial grounds and exhibition or any part thereof on the day or days herein specified.

Mr. WILLIS. I have received numerous petitions and memorials entreating me to vote for the pending measure and they have been supplemented by personal entreaties. I cannot comply with such requests. My official oath, as I understand it, is the gauge of my official action. As a trustee of the people I wish to do nothing beyond that which the letter of their authority justifies. Believing the appropriation asked for unwarranted by the Constitution, I oppose it without hesitation and without reluctance.

There lives not under the shadow of the flag a citizen more exultant than I that in 1876 this Republic shall have attained the one hundredth year of its existence as an independent nation, or who more proudly than I recalls its glorious birth, its fidelity to those principles which gave it life, its unequalled achievements in war and peace, or who would more zealously than I contribute to the success of its centennial anniversary.

That the Government has hitherto uniformly and unequivocally expressed its unwillingness to become responsible for the cost of this exhibition in nowise concerns me or affects my judgment. If the measure were right, if it were constitutional, I should vote for it cheerfully, any former reservation to the contrary notwithstanding. The object is grand; it appeals to all that is patriotic and just in the human soul. The place where the celebration is to be held is justly hallowed as a shrine in the hearts of millions.

But while we are celebrating the birth of the Republic let us take care lest we contribute to its burial; let us take care lest in celebrating its foundation upon the enduring principles of justice we are not in reality undermining its foundation. Tacitus, the historian, far back in the centuries, wrote for the instruction of his heathen countrymen what every intelligent citizen of this Republic should well know: that the desire of rule is the most powerful affection of the human mind.

The same author instructs us further that in the state which is most corrupt the laws are the most numerous. Our fathers were warned by these admonitions. They established our Constitution upon a complete and thorough recognition of the only just and legitimate purpose of human government, that every citizen should have the right to exercise his faculties and enjoy the fruit of such exercise by the enforcement of certain conditions and restraints and burdens which should operate equally on all, be borne equally by all, and equally benefit all.

Any government which recognizes any purpose other than this and beyond this is unrepublican, undemocratic, and should not be tolerated by an enlightened people. Our Government does recognize such a purpose, though it has been frequently ignored, frequently departed from, sometimes flagrantly violated and assailed. But it occurs to me that in this centennial year it is a befitting time to resolve that henceforth this purpose shall be severely respected and amply vindicated.

Taxation is authorized only for the purpose of carrying on the functions of government. The functions of government can be employed only in the enforcement of the law of equal freedom. Is self-jollification one of these functions? Is getting up a grand, magnificent exposition one of these functions? How do moneys appropriated for such a purpose in any measure make the people more secure in the possession of their absolute rights? There is no clause in the Constitution which justifies this appropriation. Here is the rule of construction which has been accepted by all the courts:

Powers not granted by the Constitution cannot be exercised by Congress; and certainly all must agree that no powers are granted, except what are expressed as such or are fairly applicable as requisite means to attain the end of a power which is granted; or in other words, which are necessary and proper to carry out those which are expressed, in execution.

There is nothing in the Constitution which justifies this appropriation or authorizes taxation for any such purpose. It is only by virtue of that loose construction, that broad interpretation which twists and stretches and tortures the Constitution according to fancy or caprice—which, whenever a new human want finds expression, discovers a new governmental purpose—that the authority for making this appropriation can be found.

Here are some of the arguments urged, some of the reasons set forth in favor of making this appropriation.

First, that the governmental faith has been pledged to secure the success of the enterprise.

Second, that humiliation and disgrace will ensue in the event of failure, and that the enterprise will fail unless the Government comes to the rescue.

Third, that it is national, and every citizen is interested in its success.

Fourth, that it is an affair which cannot occur again in the lifetime of living men—but once in a century.

Fifth, that like appropriations have been heretofore made without any express grant in the Constitution to warrant them.

Mr. Chairman, if all these reasons were sound—if all the facts taken together were actual, as alleged—we still should be strangely indifferent to our sense of duty if we deemed them sufficient to control our action in the premises. But it is untrue that the governmental faith has been pledged for any such purpose. Every official act, as the records show, was accompanied with a guarded disclaimer of pecuniary responsibility; and if such a pledge had been made in contravention of law it would be entitled to neither observance nor respect. It is undoubtedly true that if this enterprise should fail humiliation and disgrace would follow, but not to the Government, for the Government and this enterprise, by virtue of the organic law of the nation, are strangers to each other. Rather to the men who have acquired surplus wealth and can well afford to contribute a part in behalf of an enterprise so praiseworthy. It is true that it is a national affair and every citizen is interested in its success. So is every citizen interested in the diffusion of knowledge, in the growth of virtue, in the spread of religion, in every material undertaking. Shall the Government, therefore, become a co-worker in all the moral movements of the age and contribute to the success of every business undertaking of the century?

It is true, likewise, that this affair cannot occur again in the lifetime of this generation unless, happily, we are to be blest with a new providential dispensation. But if an exposition is good every one hundred years, if a celebration is good every hundred years, why are they not equally good every fifty years, and every twenty-five years, and every ten years? Will the advocates of this measure intelligently respond to this inquiry?

How shall we deal with their last argument, the mightiest of all, that which is based upon precedents, to the effect that heretofore appropriations of like character have been made for like purposes but less consequential and less deserving. We shall attempt no refutation of this fact. We sadly acknowledge it to be true; we confess to the guilt which the existence of this fact implies. But will gentlemen plead for the commission of a new wrong because like wrongs have been perpretated before? Does wrong become sanctified by frequent repetition? For my part, the duty of opposing this appropriation is more commanding for this very reason. It is time this wandering and this drifting from original land-marks should be checked. It is time this spirit of restlessness and discontent, which despises restraint and mocks at the doctrine of strict construction, should be rebuked.

O! gentlemen, do not exclaim with an air of triumph in your voices that such things have been done. True, too true, such appropriations have been made all through our history, made with wanton disregard of the Constitution; but the people never aquiesced in them until absorbed by the grand problems of war and debauched by the poison of speculation, when they became nonchalant and indifferent. Rulers exercised prerogatives and employed arbitrary excesses of power with impunity; they fattened upon the patronage which such custom yielded them. A noxious plant, in obedience to its nature, brought forth a poisonous, deadly fruit.

The simplicity and purity of our earlier history are no longer visible in the administration of the Government. Its functions have been indefinitely multiplied. It has built railroads; become parent, schoolmaster, banker; and now it proposes to go into the show business. Scarcely any one stops to inquire, what the fundamental law prescribes.

The people in their capacity as sovereigns have determined to dam up this current upon which the Republic has floated well-nigh to irrecoverable ruin. They insist that the Government shall be confined within its appropriate sphere. They demand that their rulers shall regard their oaths. They say to them, "Step not one foot beyond your constitutional limit, or you will find death." Heeding this voice, it is befitting that we should recognize it and vote against this appropriation.

The expense of this celebration should be borne by the thousands and tens of thousands of men whose wealth is the product of our free institutions; by those who have harvested ample fortunes from their country's woes, or who have acquired it by inheritance. If these classes are not unintelligent, unpatriotic, and short-sighted, they will swell the centennial fund to a full, well-rounded measure and secure the success of the centennial enterprise. Let it be proclaimed that this exposition, where all the nations of the earth are invited to participate, is the free-will offering of a great people who have grown rich and mighty and intelligent under the auspices of a Government where written law is respected, where no force is exerted save to protect person and property, where no tribute is exacted save for the same just and necessary end.

Mr. Chairman, taxation means that the sweat of the toilsmen shall pay the expense of the proposed celebration. The few rich men will escape, while the poor people will wear the yoke. The millions who consume those articles upon which, according to our iniquitous tariff, duties are imposed and levied are the men whose purses will be emptied that the nation may have a grand jubilee in celebrating its one hundredth birthday. These poor people will not figure in the celebration. They will read of it perhaps, but their limited means will not enable them to make a pilgrimage to the spot and rejoice in the pageantry that their hard earnings shall have paid for. Thank God, such a wrong as this is not tolerated by the Constitution of my country!

Mr. Chairman, the people long since would have secured the absolute success of this enterprise had it not been for the belief that Congress, when the time came for the purpose of self-glorification, would make lavish contribution; a belief engendered by the false notions of government which have prevailed during the last decade; a belief which is the natural outgrowth of a legislative history redolent with credit mobiliers, with paving frauds, with steamship subsidies, with frauds immeasurable and innumerable.

Mr. Chairman, what a sad spectacle that this great Republic, just emerging from behind the black clouds of war, exulting in the salvation of the Union and the emancipation of a race, should encounter a peril yet mightier than rebellion in this disposition to override all constitutional limitations. But the people a year ago bestirred themselves. They recognized the peril when for the first time in fifteen years they made this House democratic. And now we find ourselves subjected to a test. We are to determine whether the people wisely confided to us the work of reform; whether we are wedded to that rigid, old-fashioned faith of which Jefferson and Jackson were the most conspicuous exponents and exemplars. In vain we call ourselves democrats if we vote for this appropriation. Party names are of slight consequence. Professions of party allegiance will be deemed as idle boasts, unless we make our party an agency through which constitutional limitations are restored, just principles maintained, and an honest policy of administration carried out.

Mr. Chairman, let us not be betrayed by the plausible pretense that adding just one more to the appropriations already made will work but slight harm. If we refuse the prayer of Philadelphia in this particular instance, an instance so conspicuous, we emphasize the resolve.

Mr. KELLEY. Let me say that Philadelphia has no prayer in this matter. The gentleman is talking about an international exhibition ordained by Congress and the executive commission in charge of which was appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. WILLIS. If we refuse, then, the prayer of those men who ask that the Government shall, despite the Constitution, make this appropriation for an exposition to be held in Philadelphia in 1876, we emphasize our resolve to restore constitutional limitations: we invoke to return the spirit of liberty, without which the Republic cannot endure; we heed the exclamation which history sadly utters: alas, by what slight causes the mightiest states are overthrown!

Mr. Chairman, government supplies a need. That need results from man's depravity. His disinclination to obey the moral law renders necessary the restraint of man's law. The measure of such government, the extent of such restraint, depends upon the measure of such need and the extent of such depravity.

Therefore should we be warned at every assumption of power; at every governmental excess. Either bespeaks danger and reveals a backward tendency. To keep society intact is the sole office of government; any need beyond this the genius and energy of man can compass. A governmental agency is always less economical and efficient than private enterprise. This appropriation belongs to that species of special legislation which has transformed our legislative halls into auction houses, which has cursed this nation with monopolies, and brought democracy into disrepute.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken more warmly and fully perhaps than has been pleasant to this House, in order that my motive for opposing this appropriation should be fully and completely understood. I have repeated familiar truths. I have done so, believing with Seneca "that cannot be too often repeated which is never sufficiently learned." I have done so, believing that rather than expend money for a jubilee in 1876 we should by an example of reverent love for the Constitution bequeath to our posterity the privilege of celebrating the continued existence of the Republic in 1976.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, while I admire the remarks which my colleague from New York [Mr. WILLIS] has addressed to the committee, I am sorry that he has felt constrained to make his speech, for it compels me to violate two good resolutions, in which I have no doubt I had the concurrence of every new member of this House: the first, that we the new members ought to sit here patiently and learn wisdom at the feet of those older members, who can teach us the ways of experience and of wisdom. And during the last week, Mr. Chairman, I confess I thought I was making considerable progress. I learned with what address and with what vigor a question can be debated in this House, and I felt that in the course of time I might probably begin to comprehend what was the nature of unanimous consent and several other things which have puzzled me very much since I have had a seat on this floor. [Laughter.] The other resolution, which no doubt I formed in common with most of my fellow-members, was that nothing short of a surgical operation would extract a vote from me for any new appropriation from the public Treasury, not imperatively necessary, for any purpose whatever until after the presidential election.

But the speech of my colleague [Mr. WILLIS] compels me to give up these half-formed resolutions. He is the representative of a district that is conterminous with my own in the city of New York for a distance of four or five miles. Upon his side of the line reside the wealthiest capitalists in this country. He has the honor upon this floor to represent the richest and, it is to be presumed, the most cultivated and cultured constituency in the United States. Upon the other side of the line is the district which I represent, filled with the honest sons of toil. There is scarcely a corner of it in which there is a man who does not earn his daily bread by the labor of his hands. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the gentleman represents the sentiments of his constituents in the position which he has taken upon this floor, and I am sure that when he speaks of the oppressive weight of taxation that the passage of this measure will impose upon the laboring classes of this country, I speak the honest sentiments of my own constituents when I say that there is not a man of them that will not gladly stand the three and a half cents which the passage of this bill will impose upon his individual head.

Mr. Chairman, the position of the gentleman suggests a scene which I witnessed a few years ago at a great meeting in New York, held for the reception of Red Cloud and his associated Indians, who, you will remember, came to Washington to explain their grievances to their great father and get redress. When they came back to New York a great meeting was held, crowded beyond any meeting that I have ever seen in that city; and these untutored sons of the forest came upon the stage, and, first of all, Red Cloud, wrapping himself in his blanket, tall, gaunt, meager, told that assembled crowd the sufferings of his race and the wrongs which they had sustained from the management of the Indian affairs of this country. Tears came into the eyes of all as they looked upon the stately form of this noble son of the forest, and the impression made was of so solemn a character that it was positively necessary to get some relief from the effect. And so as he sat down the medicine-man of the tribe, and I believe the medicine-man is always the funny man—some of the doctors in this House undoubtedly will confirm what I say [laughter]—the medicine-man stood out. He was a large and portly man, beyond the ordinary dimensions even of white men whose lot has fallen in pleasant places. Looking for a moment upon this great crowd, which comprised the intelligence, the wealth, the philanthropy, and much of the beauty of the city of New York, he stood still, and then slowly beginning to speak, he said, "Look at me"—and his dimensions seemed to be double what they were when he first came upon the platform [laughter]—"look at me; once I was young, I was slender and tall and graceful as the gazelle that travels my native plains. That was before the Indian agent came among us. [Laughter.] Look at me now," and he spread his blanket—I was going to say to the four winds of heaven—"see what proportions I have achieved; it is not what I have eaten and drunk! See the lies they have stuffed me full of!" [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to insinuate that it is pabulum of that sort which has developed my colleague into the pleasant and goodly proportions which he presents to this House. [Laughter.] But I think, if I may be permitted the comparison, that when we are contrasted together the difference between daily contact with men of millions which he from his position and representation enjoys and my contact with men of toil may possibly account for the difference which you see in our relative proportions and possibly the divergent views which we take of this subject before the committee. [Renewed laughter.].

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a word to say as to the amendment, which I believe was offered by an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. If I correctly understand the purport of that amendment, it is to open the Centennial on the 4th day of July, 1876, free to all citizens of the United States; and, further, that on one day of the week it shall be open free to all comers. Now, it will occur to the gentlemen of this House that while any body of managers charged with the conduct of such an exhibition will only be too glad to commend themselves to the confidence and general favor of the people of this country by opening the doors upon the 4th day of July—and they will surely do so provided it can be done with safety to human life—I think the gentleman who offers the amendment will scarcely be inclined to press it when he reflects upon the nature of the celebration which the people of the country mean to make on the 4th day of July, 1876. There may be a million of people pressing for entrance at the doors of the building; and I, who have seen these great crowds at foreign exhibitions, beg to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that what he proposes is simply a physical impossibility.

As to the other portion, it is simply a benefaction to the city of Philadelphia. It provides that the doors shall be opened one day in a week free, and the people who will avail themselves of that privilege will be mainly population of Philadelphia, who will crowd in then to escape paying their fair proportion of the expenses of the exhibition.

I do not mean to impugn at all the liberality or munificence of the people of Philadelphia in saying this, for when I come to deal with that subject I shall do their public spirit full justice. But I call attention to the fact that what the gentleman intends for the people of the United States will only be a boon to the people of Philadelphia for which they do not ask and which I venture to say they would decline.

Mr. KELLEY. Against granting which, in their name and as one of their Representatives, I protest. They do not want to be treated as an eleemosynary institution.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If, Mr. Chairman, I venture to address the House upon this bill when other members from my own State longer in the public service are silent, it is because I am the only member of this body who is also a member of the centennial board of finance, created and charged by the act of Congress with the duty of raising the means, erecting the buildings, and distributing the proceeds of the international exhibition of 1876, to be held in the city of Philadelphia.

NATIONAL AND NOT STATE CORPORATION.

And for the same reason let me correct at the outset an erroneous impression which I have found to prevail in the minds of some of the members of this House that the centennial board of finance is a private corporation created by the State of Pennsylvania. It derives its existence solely under the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, has no corporate relations whatever derived from or depending upon the State of Pennsylvania, is in no wise accountable to the Commonwealth, but is bound to make report from time to time to the President of the United States of the progress of the work, and in a final report present a full exhibit of the result of the United States centennial celebration and exhibition of 1876.

PUBLIC AND NOT A PRIVATE CORPORATION.

Neither is it a private corporation in any fair sense of that term. It is an agency created by the authority of the National Government for the accomplishment of a great public purpose, as declared in the preamble of the original act of Congress, passed March 3, 1871, to wit, "that the completion of the first century of our national existence shall be commemorated by an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind in comparison with those of older nations." The essence of a private corporation is that it is created for private gain. The essence of a public corporation is that it exists solely for the public good. The centennial board of finance is strictly a corporation of the latter class. No idea or possibility of private or personal advantage enters or can enter into its composition. It can only result in a heavy personal loss to those who, from motives of patriotism only, have subscribed to its stock. Under no conceivable circumstances can there be any distribution of profits. The best result that can be expected from it is that some small portion of the capital invested in it may be returned to the subscribers, and to the Government in case this bill is passed. I am thus careful to explain the true nature of this so-called corporation, (a corporation which is in reality a commission created by the United States to collect the free-will offerings of the people for a public purpose, to administer them with fidelity and return to the subscribers whatever proportion may be realized from the sale of the property after the exhibition is closed,) in order to distinguish the case from subsidies to private corporations organized for private profit, against which this House has committed itself by a formal resolution, the force of which I am not willing to impair even if it should cost the failure of this bill, which has nothing in common with private interests.

HONEST, ECONOMICAL, AND ABLE ADMINISTRATION OF THE CENTENNIAL BOARD OF FINANCE.

As a member of the centennial board of finance not residing in Philadelphia, and therefore not engaged in the actual expenditure of the funds which have been provided by subscription or otherwise, but responsible to the country for their honest expenditure, I take this occasion to bear testimony to the singular ability, rigid economy, and absolute integrity with which the trust confided to the board has been executed by the committee of management, at the head of which stands the honored name of John Welsh. A grateful country will do honor to him and his self-sacrificing coadjutors when it comes to realize the fruits of their labors in the creation of the greatest wonder of the ages without having allowed a dollar to be wasted or stolen from the fund confided to them by the patriotism of their fellow-citizens.

IS THIS APPROPRIATION THE RIGHT THING TO DO?

An undertaking of this nature, so inaugurated and so conducted, must and does commend itself to the confidence and favorable consideration of this House. We all desire to promote its full and successful completion, provided we have the constitutional right to do so and provided it is the right thing to do. I address myself first to the last point. Is it the right thing to do to vote a million and a half of dollars from the public Treasury in order that the international exhibition may be opened to the world free and clear of any debt? The country is suffering from stagnation in business; the taxes, national, State, and municipal, are getting to be well-nigh intolerable; the laboring classes are in distress from want of adequate employment; and capital is shrinking back into the secret recesses where it fancies itself secure from the dangers of inflation on the one hand and of contraction on the other. Is it a time, then, to spend a large sum of the people's money for any purpose not strictly required to maintain the existence and good faith of the Government? The answer must be in the negative, unless it can be shown that this expenditure will tend to relieve rather than aggravate the general distress, or unless the good faith of the Government is so pledged that our honor will be imperiled by the refusal to provide the means for the completion of the preparations indispensable for the success of the undertaking. But I think that it can be demonstrated that we are not only bound in honor to make the necessary appropriation, but that it will be profitable to the country to do so.

OBLIGATION OF HONOR.

And first as to the matter of honor. On the 5th of June, 1874, Congress passed an act to the effect—

That the President be requested to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations, to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876: Provided, however, That the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any expenses attending such exposition or by reason of the same.

Here is an express disclaimer of all pecuniary liability on the part of the Government, and yet the President of the United States did, in accordance with this act, as it was his duty to do, invite foreign governments to take part in the exposition, and these governments have accepted the invitation to the number of thirty-eight.

SPACE ASSIGNED TO FOREIGN EXHIBITORS.

Their subjects who have decided to become exhibitors have been awarded space in the buildings now being erected by the centennial board of finance. The total cost of these buildings will be $6,724,000. Of the space which they cover, 36½ per cent. has been assigned to these foreign exhibitors.

COST.

The actual money cost of this space is therefore over $2,400,000. Somebody must pay for this space. The foreign exhibitors cannot be asked to pay this sum; for they are here, already at great cost to themselves, on the invitation of the President of the United States, as the guests of the nation.

WHO SHALL PAY THE DEFICIENCY?

The United States has made no provision for these guests, relying upon the public spirit of the people to provide the necessary funds. Owing mainly to the depressed condition of business, the people have fallen short in their contributions to the extent of $1,500,000. Who is to make good this deficiency? Shall it be the people of Pennsylvania?

ACTION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Of the $5,187,000 already raised the people of that State have contributed $4,700,000 and the remainder of the United States have subscribed $500,000. Pennsylvania has thus paid for every foot of space that will be occupied by American exhibitors, so that the other States will be the guests of Pennsylvania alone. Every dollar subscribed outside of that State has been appropriated to paying for the accommodation assigned to the foreign exhibitors, and if the other States had subscribed, as they should have done, enough to pay for this foreign space no application would have been necessary to Congress. With a delicacy as rare as it is generous, Pennsylvania has refrained from referring to the fact that at her own cost and charge she has made ample provision for her sister States, proving by this act of self-denial that she is altogether worthy of the singular honor which she enjoys in being the birthplace of American Independence thus to be celebrated within her borders in its centenuial year by all the people of the United States and all the nations of the world, including even the mother country from whom the memorable Declaration separated us politically forever.

POSITION OF OTHER STATES.

If we impose upon Pennsylvania the obligation to provide at her own charge not only for our people but for the foreign guests of the nation, munificent as she has already been, I have no doubt that her generosity will be equal even to this unreasonable request, in order that the nation may not be disgraced in the eyes of the world. But how will the other States feel when they know now for the first time that Pennsylvania has already defrayed the entire cost of the American portion of the exhibition, leaving only to the country at large the provision required for the guests of the nation? Surely no State in our Union, and certainly not the State of New York, will be willing thus to impose upon the magnanimity of a sister State already extravagant in the exercise of liberality.

AMERICAN HOSPITALITY.

It has been the boast of Americans that in this country the "latch-string hangs outside," and I very much mistake the temper of this people if, having asked the guests, they desire either to give them scant courtesy or to avoid footing the bill or to transfer the burden of it to the State of Pennsylvania. We may be poor, but we are not yet so poor that we cannot spare three and a half cents per head in order to discharge the sacred duties of national hospitality. We expended over $100,000,000 last year in alcoholic drinks in the State of New York alone. Surely the whole United States will not be impoverished by devoting $1,500,000 to the proper reception of the goods of the strangers whom we have invited to our shores for our profit and enjoyment.

WHAT SHALL WE SAY TO OUR GUESTS?

Are we to tell these guests of the nation that we made an express reservation against pecuniary liability in the act of Congress authorizing the invitation? Did we make it in the invitation which we extended to foreign nations? And if we had made such a reservation, would it not have been the essence of meanness, at which every American would have hung his head in shame? The conclusion, then, in my mind is irresistible that, having given the invitation and the invitation having been accepted, the Government is bound to pay so much of the cost of the space occupied by foreigners as has not been and cannot now be raised by private subscription.

A PAYING INVESTMENT.

But, Mr. Chairman, aside from the question of honor and duty, I am quite clear that the expenditure of this money, and indeed of the entire cost of the exposition, will be largely reproductive to the country, and that its salutary effects will not only be immediate, but permanent. The country is in the condition of a man who has just turned the crisis of a violent fever. It is exhausted by long sickness and low diet. The system must be built up anew, and it must begin with stimulants.

EXPENDITURES OF FOREIGN VISITORS.

The strangers who will come from abroad will be consumers of our products, spending money brought into the land from the outside.

EXPENDITURES OF AMERICANS.

Our own people will necessarily put into rapid circulation money that is now reserved for just such opportunities as this exposition will afford. Our railways, who are large customers for the staple manufactures of the country, will be crowded with passengers, our hotels with guests, and our shops with customers.

EFFECT ON BUSINESS.

The channels of business will thus be re-opened, and once started, we all know cannot again be clogged except by the débris of another financial convulsion. The first effect will be felt in the employment of the large army of laborers now standing idle, consuming without producing wealth. The country will feel better, confidence will be restored, and the enterprise and energy of our people once more assert themselves in opening new highways of communication, and redeeming from desolation the still boundless territory of the West and South open to settlement. The second century of the Republic will be inaugurated by a resurrection of industry from the seeming paralysis in which its first century appears to be passing out of existence.

RESULTS OF FOREIGN EXAMINATION OF OUR RESOURCES.

But these immediate benefits, necessary as they are for the relief of the country, will be slight in comparison with the permanent advantages which we shall derive from the influx of foreign visitors, mostly men engaged in manufactures or men of wealth, who will take this occasion to study the resources and the institutions of the United States.

EXPOSITION BUILDINGS.

The very sight of the exposition buildings, so much larger and finer than the structures which were the pride of Great Britain in 1851 and 1862, of France in 1855 and 1867, and of Austria in 1872, will impress them with an idea of the greatness of this country which no other agency could effect.

PRODUCTS.

The study of our raw materials and our manufactured products and the examination of our labor-saving machinery, in which we undoubtedly surpass the world, will give them new and suggestive ideas of the forces, natural and artificial, which reside in the American people, and do more to preserve amicable relations with foreign powers than any peace societies or congresses in behalf of international arbitration.

FOREIGN CAPITAL INVESTED.

The capital of the world will be attracted to the development of our boundless resources in coal, iron, and the precious metals.

OUR DEBT.

Our ability to meet our national obligations will be so manifest, that we shall be able to negotiate our new loans at the lowest rate of interest, and thus raising our credit to a level with that of Great Britain, and removing a heavy annual burden of taxation from the productive industry of the country.

SAVING IN ANNUAL INTEREST.

A difference of 1 per cent. in the rate of interest on our national debt will effect an annual saving of over $20,000,000, and the way to save this vast sum is to inspire capitalists with confidence that we are certain to pay our debts, because we have abundant resources for the purpose. This result can surely be effected provided foreign capitalists can be satisfied that our sense of honor is proportioned to our ability to pay, and to produce this conviction we must not begin by violating the laws of hospitality, which lie at the foundation of all social confidence.

WHAT WE SHALL LEARN FROM THE FOREIGN PRODUCTS EXHIBITED.

But these results, valuable and enduring as they will be, will still be inferior to the lessons which our own people will derive from the comparison of our products with those of other nations. Only these favored few who have carefully studied the several foreign expositions can understand how inferior we are in certain departments of industry and art to the more advanced European and even some of the oriental nations. The coming international exposition will make this inferiority apparent to all the people of this country, and it has only to be made apparent in order to be overcome.

RESULTS OF FOREIGN EXHIBITIONS ON THEMSELVES.

The English exhibition of 1851 had the effect to demonstrate that Great Britain was far inferior to continental nations in the arts of design, just as it demonstrated to the continental nations their inferiority to Great Britain in agricultural implements, in machinery, and in all branches of iron and steel industry. The English government at once established schools of design throughout the empire, while the continental nations took steps to improve their iron works and machinery and develop their mineral resources. The exhibition of 1862 in London demonstrated the remarkable fact that in all the textile industries, in pottery, and in metal-work, requiring esthetic training and knowledge, Great Britain had overtaken if not gone ahead of her continental rivals, while she was beaten by Germany in her own stronghold by castings in steel so far in advance of her best results that Krupp's guns and wheels and tires were regarded with wonder and admiration approaching to incredulity. It is impossible to estimate the enormous pecuniary value of this progress to England and to Germany.

BESSEMER STEEL.

Again, at the date of the French exposition of 1867, the manufacture of Bessemer steel had begun to assume great prominence in Europe, but was only introduced into one establishment in this country, where its practice was comparatively rude and unprofitable. I had the honor to be one of the ten scientific commissioners appointed by the United States to study and report upon the exposition, and to me was assigned the subject of iron and steel. As commissioner every private establishment in England and France was opened to me, and I was thus enabled carefully to study the processes of manufacture, now so familiar but then so unknown to our metallurgists, and by the introductions which I was able to secure for our mechanical beginners to bring back the knowledge required for the successful establishment of this business. The result may be briefly stated, that we have now ten first-class establishments for the manufacture of Bessemer steel, capable of producing 500,000 tons per annum, enough to supply the demand of the country, and that the price of steel rails, which was then $140 per ton, has now fallen to $65 per ton, making an annual saving of $37,500,000 per annum. And, what is more remarkable, steel rails are now made and sold in this country as cheaply as they could be imported from abroad, and laid down west of the Alleghenies even if the duty were altogether removed.

VIENNA EXPOSITION—LEATHER.

I could adduce other marked instances of similar benefits derived from the careful study of the French exposition of 1867 made by the American commissioners at a cost of $300,000, a wise productive expenditure of money, but content myself with reciting upon the authority of my friend Jackson S. Schultz, esq., one effect of the Vienna exposition which has resulted in the establishment of a large export trade in American leather, steadily growing, and adding to our ability to resume specie payments, which we can do whenever the balance of trade will enable us to draw for coin instead of shipping our product of precious metals, as we now do.

We may safely conclude, therefore, that we shall not only rapidly assimilate the artistic skill of our foreign exhibitors, but that they in turn will find many things among our productions which they will need, and that will largely increase our exports.

I think, therefore, from the considerations which I have so hastily adduced, we may safely assert that to make the proposed appropriation, in order that the exposition may be a success, is a good thing to do, as well from considerations of interest as of honor.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER.

But there are many things good to do which Congress has no constitutional right to do. Is this appropriation one of them? The question has heretofore been argued, and members are probably familiar with the discussion. In the presence of a body so largely composed of able lawyers I approach the subject with great diffidence and would altogether refrain from touching upon it if I did not think that there is a view of the subject, conclusive to my mind, which has hitherto escaped notice. The argument heretofore has mainly referred to the question of the right of Congress to appropriate money for the centennial celebration of the Declaration of Independence. The real question seems to me to be whether Congress has a right to appropriate money for the establishment of an international exhibition of industry.

And what I have to say further is in reply to the constitutional argument of my colleague, [Mr. WILLIS.] I am no lawyer; he is eminent in that profession, and I am very reluctant to take issue with him. Still he has not touched upon the essential point in the discussion of this constitutional question, nor, so far as I know, has it been properly touched upon by any one. The argument of my colleague refers mainly to the right of Congress to appropriate money for a centennial celebration of the Declaration of Independence. It seems to me that is not the real point in issue. The question is whether Congress has the right to appropriate money for the establishment of an international exhibition of industry.

Mr. WILLIS. If my colleague will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will say that he has mistaken my argument. It was against the constitutionality of making the appropriation named in the pending bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I accept the gentleman's explanation, and still repeat what I said, that such was the line of his argument. I took down his words, and he spoke of this as "money appropriated for a jollification."

Mr. WILLIS. That is the way I characterized it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; and in that respect I say there was an entire failure to comprehend the true nature of this question. In other words, the occasion on which this exhibition is to be made should not be confounded with the exhibition itself.

ARGUMENT AS TO RIGHT TO CELEBRATE THE CENTENNIAL.

On the question of the right of Congress to provide money for the celebration of American Independence, I shall leave the argument where it stands, and confine myself to showing that appropriations for an exhibition of art and industry are quite within the powers given to Congress under the Constitution, and that it is in its discretion whether it shall establish or aid such exhibitions, and to what extent.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS ARE IN REALITY INDUSTRIAL UNIVERSITIES.

As I have endeavored briefly to show in what I have heretofore said, these exhibitions are the most potent agencies yet discovered for the education of the masses of the people in art and industry. They are in fact the industrial universities of the people, in which the skill, and labor, science, capital of the world, are united for the express and sole purpose of general instruction.

THE PRINCE CONSORT A BENEFACTOR OF THE HUMAN RACE.

The time at my disposal will only allow me to state that among philanthropists, publicists, and statesmen there is no difference of opinion on this subject, and that it is generally conceded that the late prince consort of England, to whom belongs the merit of having originated these international exhibitions, enrolled himself among the great benefactors of the human race, as well by the results already achieved throughout the civilized world, as by the continuing influence of these admirable inventions for the dissemination of the knowledge "of those arts which benefit mankind."

NO QUESTION AS TO RIGHT TO PROMOTE EDUCATION.

Now I presume no one questions the power of the National Government to promote the education of the people. Differing, as constitutional lawyers may well do, as to the proper limitations to be applied to that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to "provide for the general welfare," no one has ever seriously questioned that the education of the people falls within the power thus granted. Precedents without number can be cited, beginning with the very foundation of the Government and coming down to our own day.

LAND FOR COMMON SCHOOLS.

The granting of every thirty-sixth section of the public lands to the new States as an educational endowment can only be justified under this clause, for, although express authority is given to dispose of the public lands, no one will contend Congress can dispose of them for any purpose not clearly indicated by the Constitution itself.

AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGES.

The grant of lands to the several States for the purpose of securing the foundation of agricultural and mechanical colleges is a case directly in point, because the same end is aimed at in these institutions as in the international exhibition, namely, the diffusion of practical knowledge in branches of industry essential to the comfort and progress of the nation.

MILITARY AND NAVAL SCHOOLS.

The maintenance of the special military and naval schools, and of the National Observatory, are only to be justified on the same theory, that they give education or knowledge essential to the general welfare, and in the same spirit money was appropriated to defray the expenses of the commissions sent out by the United States to study and report upon the several great European exhibitions of art and industry.

RIGHT TO STUDY FOREIGN EXHIBITIONS AT PUBLIC EXPENSE IMPLIES RIGHT TO HAVE THEM AT HOME.

Surely if any right existed to make such appropriations merely to bring back useful knowledge from foreign countries, it must exist to put the whole people in a position to study a similar exhibition at home for themselves under circumstances far more promising of useful and permanent results.

MISSION OF THIS CONGRESS.

I trust that I have thus shown that Congress has the right to make the proposed appropriation and that it is the right thing to do. I recognize fully that if this Congress has any special duty and mission to perform it is to reduce the burden of taxation by retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government, and to adopt such legislation as will tend to give activity to the stagnant and depressed industries of the country.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE FIRST CENTURY.

I understand clearly that as the first century of the Republic has been mainly and necessarily devoted to the development of the resources of the country and the opening of channels of communication, so its second century must necessarily be an era of production far in excess of the wants of our people, and needing foreign markets for their consumption.

FOREIGN MARKETS—COMPETITORS.

I understand that in these markets we shall have to meet with competitors whose energy, skill, and capital have given them a precedence and a preference which we cannot hope to overcome if we are deadweighted either by artificial impediments to trade, or by want of skill, or ignorance in the work of production. Our people need this opportunity to study their merits and our own defects.

EFFECT ON THE COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION OF THE COUNTRY.

The effect of this study will be felt, not only on the industry but upon the commercial legislation of the country. The shackles of commerce will be stricken off, and no prohibitory measures can survive the conviction which this exhibition will produce in the public mind that we must have the markets of the world for our products, or else that the career of progress in which we have hitherto moved forward so triumphantly must come to an end permanently as it has been temporarily checked with the first century of our existence. Hence, feeling convinced that the immediate and permanent results of the proposed exposition will be precisely those which the people intended to effect when they sent here a body of representatives taken fresh from their midst and largely new to public life, I am constrained to vote for this bill, and have no doubt that in so doing I shall be fully justified by the voice of my constituents and the general judgment of the country; and I venture to predict that when the American people and the members of this House shall have witnessed the magnificent display of industrial products which this exposition will contain, and have begun to measure its beneficent effects upon the destinies of the nation, the only persons throughout the land who will have reason to regret the passage of this bill will be those who, having failed to comprehend the intense spirit of patriotism, the honorable pride in the good name of the American people which distinguishes our people, just as the event itself which we propose to celebrate is distinguishable from all others in the history of man, shall not have put themselves on the record in its favor.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, obtained the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will yield I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] will be allowed a moment before the committee rises.

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. It is my misfortune, Mr. Chairman, to be called away from the further consideration of this question, which I regret extremely. But as the representative here of a populous district in the most populous city in this country next to Philadelphia, it becomes my duty to say that within an hour or two I have received a telegraphic dispatch from the chief executive officer of the city of Brooklyn, who also states that he represents the common council of the municipal government of that city, urging the Representatives from Brooklyn to favor the measure now before this committee.

It is not more my duty to give utterance here to the sentiments of the government of my city than it is my pleasure cordially to express my approbation of this measure and my hope that it will pass, and not only pass, but by a unanimous vote. We have heard already a great deal about this centennial year. If there is anything for which the representatives of this great nation should cordially, freely, and unanimously vote, in my judgment it is for this appropriation. I have listened to the constitutional objections; but they are answered by multitudinous cases of departure hitherto. But this is a case that no one of us shall ever see repeated; our children will not see it repeated. There is something sublime and magnificent in calling the nations of the earth here to meet us on this great occasion.

But I did not intend, when I began, to say a word, except simply to state that the city of Brooklyn urges this appropriation; and I will repeat, because it is not generally known in this House, that Brooklyn is the third city in the Union in population, in intelligence, in enterprise, and perhaps in wealth. And that city sends a cordial greeting to Philadelphia and urges her Representatives to favor the bill under consideration.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present twenty-one petitions, signed by a large number of citizens of Ohio, setting out that the stoppage of great works of improvement and the general depression in business in all parts of the country have lessened the demand for labor and caused the withdrawal of a great number of laborers. They believe it to be very important that every available means should be seized in this distressing crisis to revive the industries of the country, and to that end that encouragement should be given to the building of such highways across the continent as are national in their character and cannot be constructed within any reasonable time without aid from the General Government. They ask Congress, under proper guarantees, to extend the national credit to the construction of the Texas Pacific Railroad. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Railroads.

Biese, late second lieutenant of the Eighty-second Illinois Volunteers, and referred to the Committee on Claims. Upon examining the bill we find that it was before the Committee on Military Affairs at the last Congress, and that a report was made upon it by that committee. FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 141, reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 141) to amend the act entitled "An act amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was after the word "indebtedness," in line 7 of section 7, to insert the words "or the certificate of the commissioners or commissioner in lieu thereof;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That said commissioners or commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe such form as they or he may deem right and proper for the depositors to transfer their claims; but no assignment of such claims shall be valid unless it is signed by the depositor, or, if dead, by his legal representative, and is accompanied by the pass-book or other evidence of the company's indebtedness, or the certificate of the commissioners or commissioner in lieu thereof, and sworn proof to the satisfaction of the commissioners or commissioner that the assignment was executed by the proper person in good faith and for valuable consideration: Provided, That in case the person making the assignment is unable to write, a sworn statement of two witnesses, setting forth that they witnessed the execution of the assignment, and know the person who executed it to be the depositor the execution of the assignment of whose account they witnessed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "that," in the first line of section 8, to insert the words:

Said commissioners or commissioner shall be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed, at the option of the creditors of the company, upon the surrender of the pass-books or other evidence of the company's indebtedness, to issue certificates of indebtedness, payable to the order of the respective depositors or their assigns, which certificates shall state the amount due the claimant, the number of the deposit account upon which each is based, and the name of the branch from which the account was reported to them; said certificates shall take the place and be of the same value and effect as the pass-books and other evidence of indebtedness thus surrendered; and that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "shall," in line 13 of section 7, to insert the words "issue certificates of indebtedness and;" so as to read:

And that said commissioners or commissioner shall issue certificates of indebtedness and make payments to those depositors only whose pass-books have been properly verified and balanced, unless said pass-books have been lost or destroyed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 8 to insert after line 17 the words "issue certificates of indebtedness and;" so as to read:

Then upon satisfactory proof of such loss or destruction, and the amount due them, they or he may issue certificates of indebtedness and pay as though they had pass-books.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 8, line 20, to strike out "two" and insert "three" before "years," and in line 23 to strike out "two" and insert "three" before "years," so as to read:

But all claims not presented to the commissioners or commissioner for examination and audit within three years from and after the passage of this act, as well as all dividends declared upon audited accounts not called for within three years from the date of their declaration, shall be barred, and their amounts shall inure to the benefit of the other depositors of the company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 12, in the following words:

SEC. 12. That the compensation of said commissioners shall not exceed the sum of $9,000 per annum, and shall be apportioned among them by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to the services rendered and time given by each, but no one commissioner shall at any time receive more than $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also instructed by the committee to move to strike out after the word "Treasury," in line 11, section 2, the following words:

And shall operate as a discharge or cancellation of the joint bond of said present commissioners as to any and all acts of said survivors or survivor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it seems to me that an amendment should be made to the proviso in the first section. It now reads:

That no change hereafter made of said commissioners, or any of them, shall in any way impede or delay any case or cases instituted by or against said commissioners or commissioner.

I do not know that there is any case in which the commissioners are liable; but it may be that there are cases in which the commissioners may be liable for which no suits have been instituted; and I propose to amend by adding after the word "commissioner" in line 32 the words "or in cases upon which they, or any of them, may be liable."

Under the bill as it now stands they would be absolved, I think, from any case in which there might be liability unless a suit has been instituted. My purpose is simply to have their liability continued, if there be any such liability, although no suit has been already instituted.

Mr. KERNAN. I suppose this proviso is for the purpose of preventing a suit, brought by these commissioners or against them in their official capacity, abating by a change of the commissioners, not with a view of taking from or adding to their personal liability for wrong. I suggest to my friend that he had better put in the words "by or against them as such." It is the ordinary case of preventing the abating of a suit instituted by a trustee or against a trustee to reach the funds where there is a change in the trustee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My object is simply to save the liability of the commissioners if they are at present liable to any party who might have a just claim against them or any of them; but I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from New York, and modify my amendment accordingly, if he is of the opinion that such an amendment as he suggests is necessary at all.

Mr. KERNAN. I would suggest to my friend from Delaware that where he proposes his amendment he insert merely the words "by or against said commissioners or commissioner in their or his official capacity" or "as trustees." That would not affect the personal liability of any one, but will prevent actions abating where they seek to enforce a demand which belongs to the trust estate, or where there is a suit brought to establish a demand against the trust estate. That is the object, and not to prevent one of the trustees being liable personally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the clause read as it now stands in the bill reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the clause.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proviso, beginning with the twenty-ninth line, reads:

And provided further, That no change hereafter made of said commissioners, or any of them, shall in any way impede or delay any case or cases instituted by or against said commissioners or commissioner, but every such case shall, upon suggestion of such change, and due entry thereof on the dockets of the respective courts in which they may be pending, be proceeded with in the same manner as if such change had not been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the proviso by inserting after the word "commissioner," in line 32, the words "or any cases upon which they or any of them may be liable."

Mr. KERNAN. I would substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Deleware the insertion of the words "in their or his official capacity;" so as to read:

Shall in any way impede or delay any case or cases instituted by or against said commissioners or commissioner in their or his official capacity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether the word "shall" is in the proposed amendment or in the printed bill. The provision is, "the case shall proceed." I think that word ought to be "may," so that if there be a case of claim of personal liability it will be within the power of the court according to law to determine whether a change in person shall be made or not. If a suit should be pending against these commissioners for some personal dereliction, then the word "shall" might interpose a difficulty possibly. So I suggest that it be changed to "may."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this change? The Chair hears none, and the change will be made. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish simply to state that there was a proposition submitted by these trustees to the Committee on Finance in regard to the purchase of the bank building, the same proposition that was discussed somewhat at the last session, I believe. We did not think it right to introduce that subject-matter on this bill, because this was a bill merely as to the mode of proceeding and to facilitate the settlement of the affairs of the Freedman's Bank. The other question is reserved, and I trust that when it is presented to the Senate they will pay due attention to it. In my judgment the Government of the United States ought to buy the land which these trustees now hold, which would be useful to the Government, and much more valuable to the Government than to any individual. That matter is not introduced on this bill, although it relates to the Freedman's Bank and was very strongly recommended by these trustees, simply because we thought it better to leave this bill stand as a mere naked bill to aid and facilitate them in the settlement of their affairs.

Mr. WITHERS. Shall I understand the Senator from Ohio to state that a bill will subsequently be introduced to purchase the property?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; but I do not choose to embarrass this bill by that question. This bill ought to be passed now, in order to facilitate the settlement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senate, before the expiration of the morning hour, of course subject to morning business and the regular order, to consider three or four bills reported from the Committee on Claims that passed the Senate during the last Congress, and I believe one or two of them passed both Houses, but failed to reach the President of the United States in time. If there be no objection this morning, I should be very glad to call up these bills so as to have them disposed of. I know hereafter, when business shall be crowding, how difficult it will be to get attention to these bills. These bills have all been examined by the committee at this Congress, and they were at the last Congress, and some at the Congress before. If there be no objection, I should like to get up these bills this morning. Of course, if there be objection or if matters more important shall be called up, I shall not insist.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the first bill the Senator wishes to call up?

Mr. WRIGHT. The first bill to which I ask the attention of the Senate is the bill (S. No. 63) granting relief to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs of General James H. Carleton, deceased. I think that is a claim of $7,000 for property that was in the possession of the General Government where there were military supplies stored, and the property was destroyed by the order of Major-General Canby. As to the loyalty of the persons owning this property and their right to recover there can be no reasonable doubt. The bill was passed by the Senate at the last session, and was I believe by the House, but failed to reach the President in time.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be taken up subject to the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the proposition.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was very glad to hear the business with which my friend from Iowa rose, although I was disappointed, as I supposed the first bill he would present would be that for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins, as that passed both Houses of Congress and failed only through a clerical mistake, or rather because there was not time for the enrollment of the bill in order to present it to the President. I am sure he will not fail to bring that up among the others.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall certainly do so at the very earliest moment, if I can have the consent of my friend that I may proceed with these other bills.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly; not doubting that that will come up in time.

HEIRS OF JAMES H. CARLETON.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 63) granting relief to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs of General James H. Carleton, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs of General James H. Carleton, or their legal representatives, for property destroyed by order of General Canby, dated Fort Craig, New Mexico, February 21, 1862, the sum of $7,600.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported by the Committee on Claims with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. WRIGHT. Of course I shall not resist the reading of the report, but I suggest to my friend from Vermont that I can state to him the general nature of this case, and if there be any question he wishes to ask I shall be very glad to answer it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be very happy to hear my friend from Iowa, and at the same time I can be reading the report.

Mr. WRIGHT. This property was owned by the children of General James H. Carleton, at Albuquerque, New Mexico. It was taken possession of under a contract with the proper department for the purpose of depositing supplies belonging to the General Government. While it was thus held under contract by the General Government, General Canby made an order that the supplies be destroyed to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. The destruction of these supplies necessitated the destruction of the property also. Afterward a board of survey was called, examined the damages done, and made a report, and the report of the committee is in accordance with the report of this board of survey. They found that the children were entitled to so much, and this bill allows them the sum which was thus allowed, as I now remember.

Mr. HAMILTON. I should like to ask my friend from Iowa how it became necessary to destroy the buildings? The order was to destroy the supplies, as I understood.

Mr. WRIGHT. It became necessary for the reason that the emergency was so great, the danger so imminent, that there was no time to remove the supplies, and in destroying the supplies they had to destroy the buildings containing them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have listened to my friend from Iowa with pleasure, as I always do, and if it appeared from his report that it was necessary to destroy these buildings which the Government held under rent and were therefore in the proper possession of he would make a pretty good case; but I do not see, in running my eye over the report, and I do not hear anything from him upon the subject of how the necessity arose for burning up a building instead of hauling out and throwing into the river the quartermaster's stores which were stored in this place. There were shops, stables, store-houses, hospitals, &c. Look at the items.

For 59 doors and gates destroyed	$837 00
For 57 windows destroyed	923 00
For 25,047 feet of lumber, at $50 per 1,000 feet	1,252 35
For 714 roof timbers, at $3 each	2,142 00
For 51,528 adobes, at $12 per 1,000	618 00
For laying up walls	810 33
For carpenter's work, laying floors, &c	250 32
For nails and locks and grating to windows	350 00
For plastering and finishing walls	192 00
For removing ruins	125 00
For contingent expenses	100 00
Total damages to 12 houses and 7 corrals	7,600 00

I do not see in the report anywhere a statement as to the particular circumstances which made it necessary to destroy the buildings themselves in which this property was kept, in which these horses were. If there was such a necessity, so that the order would have covered it, it would have been one thing; but as the Senator from Texas says, this order was—

You will hold yourself prepared to remove or destroy all public property, and particularly provisions, so that nothing that is useful may fall into the hands of the enemy.

That order is signed by E. R. S. Canby. The report says—

That this order was carried into effect, so far as concerns the destruction of claimant's property, is set forth in the following certificate of Captain Enos:

"I certify that the houses and buildings belonging to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, situated in the town of Albuquerque, New Mexico, were, by my order, destroyed by fire on the 2d day of March, 1862, to prevent the public property stored therein from falling into the hands of the rebel enemy."

That is dated September 29, 1862. The order of Canby to destroy or remove the public property was dated on the 21st of February, 1862, being seven months preceding this destruction made by Captain Enos, and then so far as I see, as I say, I do not perceive that the report states how it happens that after seven months within which to remove the public property from these buildings that were so imminently threatened the quartermaster took occasion to destroy them then. Undoubtedly my friend can explain it, but it does not appear in the report.

Mr. WRIGHT. We acted upon the report of Major-General Canby and the order that was made by the subordinate officer afterward; and we went upon this hypothesis of presumptions: that where an order had been made by the proper military officer and that order had been carried out subsequently, the presumption was that the danger was so imminent that the destruction was proper and justifiable. In this case, it having thus been made, and a board of survey having afterward been called by the proper military authorities to examine, investigate, and report the amount of injury done and the amount that the parties were entitled to, and they having made this report and found this amount due, we, as the committee did at the last Congress, and as the committee of the last Congress in the House did also, as I now remember, reported this bill as it had been reported before.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask my friend from Iowa one question, whether it appears by this report that these buildings were within our lines?

Mr. WRIGHT. The buildings were at Albuquerque, and were in the possession of our troops.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The property may have been within the possession of our troops.

Mr. WRIGHT. And it was within our lines.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That ought to appear in the report.

Mr. HAMILTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa again if these buildings and the supplies were burned in the face of the enemy. My recollection is that General Sibley did not reach that point. He was met by General Canby's troops, and captured before he reached that neighborhood or anywhere near it; but the bill itself and the report imply that our troops at this point were in imminent danger, in a critical position, liable to be captured and the stores taken, when the truth is that General Canby captured General Sibley almost without a fight. He had very little trouble in doing it, and supplied him with provisions, &c., to allow his men to reach their own homes again. That is the truth about it, and I suspect that these supplies were burned after Sibley left the country—I have no doubt about it myself—burned possibly because they were useless to the Army, and Canby's forces wanted to leave that section of the country and therefore destroyed the supplies; but I should like myself to have the case go over for further consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can hardly conceive why this case should go over, but of course if there be objection it will have to go over; and yet the bill is now before the Senate. I suppose myself that though it be true that the officer was mistaken as to the imminence of the danger, yet, inasmuch as the Government had possession of these buildings under a contract and they were within our lines, and the owners of the property thus had no control over it, if the proper officer ordered their destruction the Government would be liable; and that is the theory on which the bill goes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I really wish that the Senator from Iowa would consent to let this bill be recommitted to the committee for a little further inquiry. The order, as I have said, is dated in February, and is addressed to the commanding officer at that post. The destruction took place in September following, seven months afterward, by a captain and quartermaster, not a person in command of the post, on the face of the papers. He might have been in command of the post, but it is rare that quartermasters are, and he in his certificate does not state that he has done it in pursuance of the order of General Canby, dated seven months before, or in pursuance of any order from superior authority. It would be desirable, as the Senator from Texas has said, to know, as we can historically and from the War Department by a little inquiry which the committee could make, what was the state of things in September, 1862, when this destruction occurred at that place. A little information on that point would make it clear to all of us, to my friend from Iowa as well as the rest of us, and if there was not any pressing necessity, it would stand on another ground, if it could stand at all. If there was this overpowering necessity in order to prevent the stores falling into the hands of the enemy, then it would be a clear case for these claimants if they were loyal, because we were holding the property under rent. So I suggest to my friend to allow it to be recommitted for that inquiry.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend not to have the bill recommitted. There is, perhaps, no necessity for that. The information can be obtained as well without a recommitment. I do not wish to take up time with this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would rather have the information in a written report, so as to have the facts shown on the record.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can consent to the bill being passed over for the present, and if I do not get the information before the bill is called up again, so as to satisfy the Senator, he can move that it be recommitted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let the bill be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PEASLEY & M'CLARY.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 191.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 191) for the relief of Peasley & McClary, of Nashua, New Hampshire, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Treasury is by the bill directed to pay to Peasley & McClary, of Nashua, New Hampshire, $125, in full compensation for their services in transferring the mails, and the route-agent in charge of them, from the depot of the Worcester and Nashua Railroad to the depot of the Wilton Railroad, in the city of Nashua, from the 2d day of December, 1867, until the 18th day of January, 1869.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the chairman would explain that a little.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps it would be shorter to hear a statement. Ordinarily the Post-Office Department is supplied with money to pay for work of this character. My inquiry is simply how it happens that these gentlemen did not get their pay in the regular way through the Department instead of coming here with a special bill?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The report is very short.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. CHRISTIANCY on the 7th of January, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of Peasley & McClary, for transporting the mails and mail agent from the depot of the Worcester and Nashua Railroad to that of the Wilton Railroad in the city of Nashua, New Hampshire, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That they find the facts of the case correctly stated in the report of this committee submitted at the last regular session, (January 27, 1875,) which is as follows:

"It appears from the evidence submitted in this case that, in 1867, the mail route from Worcester, Massachusetts, to Nashua, New Hampshire, was extended to Wilton, New Hampshire. This required the transfer of the route agent and the mails from the Worcester and Nashua Railroad depot to the Wilton Railroad depot, a distance of about half a mile across the city of Nashua; and at the request of Mr. Burt, postmaster at Boston, who made provision for said extension, Peasley & McClary performed this service. The connection between the trains was close, and it required them to be promptly on hand to insure the transfer. They performed this service from December 2, 1867, to January 18, 1869, supposing the postmaster at Boston had authority to pay them.

"Before the presentation of their claim to the Post-Office Department, more than two years had elapsed, and the unexpended balances had been covered into the Treasury under the act of July 12, 1870, leaving no fund from which they could be paid.

"There seems to be no question that the service was faithfully performed and that claimants have not been paid. They transferred the route agent and his mails for one year, one month, and sixteen days, and they offered to settle with Mr. Burt at $100 per annum.

"We report a bill to pay them $125, as a substitute for the bill (S. No. 821) referred to us, and recommend its passage."

In this report and its recommendations your committee fully concur, and herewith report and recommend the passage of the amended bill as reported by that committee.

Your committee will further state that this bill appears to have passed the Senate at its last regular session and been sent to the House, where no final action was had upon it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. M. PURVIANCE AND F. WYETH.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 192, for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth, reported by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth of $4,500, to be in full satisfaction to them, and all persons claiming under them, for the use, occupation, and destruction of their property by the military authorities of the United States in Saint Joseph, Missouri, in the years 1861, 1862, and 1863.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL on the 7th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth, praying compensation for the use and occupation, as well as for the destruction, of their property at Saint Joseph, Missouri, by the military authorities of the United States, having considered the same, beg to submit the following report:

The petitioners allege, and the allegations of the petitioners are clearly sustained by the evidence submitted, that they are and have been since the summer of 1859 the joint owners of lot No. 3, in block No. 22, in the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri; that when they purchased this property, in 1859, and at the time the same was taken possession of by the military authorities of the United States, as hereinafter stated, there were two substantial frame dwellings thereon in good condition and repair; on the north half of said lot was a frame building, one story high, fronting 20 feet on Main street and extending back 80 feet, with room on Main street, with an open front used for store-room, and also containing four additional rooms; and on the south side of said lot was a new three-story frame building fronting 20 feet on Main street and extending back 80 feet, and having also an open front. This latter building had on the lower floor one large room used as a store-room, full size of the building, and on the second and third floors twenty-six rooms, which adjoined and were attached to the Planter's Hotel, and were rented and used by the proprietors of such hotel as a part of it.

That during the years 1858, 1859, and part of 1860 the whole property was rented at an annual rental of $2,700, and during the latter part of 1860 and first part of 1861, and up to and immediately prior to its occupation by the Federal forces, the said two buildings were rented at the annual rental of $1,700.

That, on the 20th day of September, 1861, this property, including the two buildings—without the consent of the petitioners or their agents—was taken possession of by a portion of the Thirty-ninth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, then in the service of the United States, and was by them used and occupied as quarters during the time they remained at Saint Joseph; and that, immediately on their departure, the Sixteenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, under command of Colonel Robert F. Smith, took possession of said premises and continued to occupy them until February, 1862, when they were vacated by said regiment and taken possession of by Captain Phelps and his command, Company A of the Fourth Regiment of Missouri State militia, (Colonel George H. Hall,) then serving in the United States service. Captain Phelps's command being cavalry, he occupied the first floor of one of the buildings for a stable and forage-house. The other rooms were occupied by the soldiers as quarters. That said buildings were occupied constantly by the Federal forces as quarters, forage-rooms, and stables for horses, without the consent of the petitioners and against the protest of their agent, from the 20th of September, 1861, until in the month of July, 1863; in all, twenty-two months.

The testimony shows that, by reason of their occupancy as stables, quarters, forage-rooms, &c., both of these buildings were rendered entirely worthless, and, soon after they were vacated by the troops, (in September, 1863,) were declared a nuisance by the city authorities of the city of Saint Joseph, and directed to be, and were, torn down, and the lumber from the wreck was valued at $250. The lowest estimate made by any witness, of the two buildings at the time they were first occupied as stated, is $3,800.

The evidence shows, and it is a part of the history of the country, that the news of the defeat of General Lyon at Wilson's Creek, in August, 1861, caused a general rising of the rebel element in Northwest Missouri, and in this portion of the State all legitimate civil authority was to a very great extent suspended. Union troops were hastily but very imperfectly organized, and without provision for their maintenance other than they could collect in the country.

Saint Joseph was selected as the place for collecting supplies and organizing Union troops in sufficient numbers to oppose the confederate army. At this time there were no regularly-organized commissary or quartermaster departments connected with these organizations, and commanders of the Federal forces took possession of such buildings for their quarters, stables, and forage-rooms as the necessities of the case demanded. And it was under such circumstances that these buildings were seized and occupied.

It appears from the affidavit of William M. Wyeth that he was the agent of the petitioners, who are citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, and who were then residing there; that he, as agent for said buildings at the time the same were being occupied by Captain B. H. Phelps's company, (A, Fourth Missouri Cavalry,) notified the quartermaster in charge that the company above described were using the first floor as a stable and forage-house, but received no answer to his communication.

The records of the War Department fail to show that any allowance has ever been made or paid to either of the petitioners, either for the use and occupation or damage done to their premises; and the affidavits, both of the petitioners and their agent, show they have never received anything. All the material facts are fully sustained by the affidavits of Brigadier-General Benjamin F. Loan, Major T. J. Chew, William M. Wyeth, Rufus H. Jordan, Rufus K. Allen, W. S. Elliott, and others, all certified by officials in the State of Missouri to be reliable persons.

It further appears from the testimony, and your committee find, that the petitioners were thoroughly and actively loyal to the Government of the United States during the rebellion.

Your committee further find, as conclusions of law based upon the above findings of facts, that the Government of the United States is liable for, and should pay to the petitioners, the reasonable value of the use and occupation of said premises for the time they were occupied as aforesaid by the Federal troops, and also for the damage done to said premises by reason of such occupancy. And in view of all the circumstances of the case—the said premises having been so used for one year and ten months, and the said buildings almost wholly destroyed by such use—your committee find petitioners are entitled to the sum of $4,500, in full for all use and occupation and destruction of their said property; and they report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT RULES OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. BAYARD. I submit a resolution which I intend to offer as a substitute for the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules on the 10th of January. I ask to have it read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committee on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine and, after conference, to report what amendments, if any, should be made in the present joint rules of the two Houses, and also whether any and what legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the present twenty-second joint rule.

The resolution was ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, is there unfinished business?

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator allow me to ask the attention of the Senate to one other bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; let us have the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I prefer that the Senator from Iowa should not interpose now.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well, then, I will not insist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. MORTON. I move to postpone that, and all prior orders, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution in regard to the Mississippi election.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would appeal to the Senator from Indiana to withdraw his motion and allow the unfinished business of yesterday to be taken up.

Mr. MORTON. I would, but I think there will be further debate on it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is likely there may be further debate; I do not know about that. I have no desire to debate it myself, but I hope it can be disposed of soon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana insist on his motion?

Mr. MORTON. I insist on my motion.

Mr. DAVIS. It is known to the Senate that the resolution now in order and before the Senate as the regular order has been debated two or three days, and it ought not to take a great while to dispose of it. I do not know, of course, how long it will take, but I think we had better continue with and dispose of that resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator let me ask—for it will govern my vote somewhat—does he know whether or not there will be further debate on the proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a few words, not occupying over ten minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. I cannot positively answer the question of the Senator from New York. I have some explanations to make, but I shall be as brief as possible, and there may be one or two other gentlemen desiring to speak, for aught I know. I cannot answer for any one but myself. I shall occupy the floor probably fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. I have been charged by a brother Senator with being very credulous, and I plead guilty to the charge. I did suppose we could vote on this resolution without much further debate, and I wish to state the reason for that supposition. A man ought to have a reason for whatever he believes. Inasmuch as everybody is in favor of this inquiry and the only question is whether it shall be made by a special or a standing committee, I confess I had thought that that issue was so narrow that after the illumination the subject had received we might vote upon it. I can see a reason why the Senator from Ohio should like to make a statement in continuation of what he said yesterday; but I would suggest to my friend from West Virginia that if he can get a vote on his resolution and have his inquiry started, it will be much more in his interest perhaps than to allow it to go over with a chance of being postponed from day to day by other things.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to my friend from New York that, if he will allow a vote to be taken on the resolution as offered by me, I am ready; but if it is to be amended—and an amendment is now pending—it is a different question altogether. I should be glad to have the resolution passed in the shape it was offered.

Mr. CONKLING. If we only had a previous question in the Senate, and I had the control of it, I could do what my friend suggests; but as we have not, I rather think the Senate will vote on such amendments as it sees fit.

Mr. DAVIS. If my friend from New York will aid me, it will go a great way toward having the resolution passed in its present shape.

Mr. CONKLING. What I am trying to do now is to aid my friend. That is to be settled by the judgment of the Senate. Why not take the judgment of the Senate? The honorable Senator from Ohio wishes to say something, which is quite natural, in reference to a statement he made yesterday. I can see the reason for that; but I must say to my friend from West Virginia—though I do not mean to dictate to him at all—that if I were in his place, and could get a vote on the resolution, I would rather have it, than allow it to be postponed upon the present motion, and perhaps to-morrow upon some other, and come to a vote at some indefinite future time; but I know it is the business of the Senator from West Virginia, and not mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 30.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] is before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, to strike out the proposition for a special committee, and insert "the Committee on Finance."

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, Mr. President, that the Senate is anxious to hear the Senator from Indiana, and I hope he will not be delayed long in presenting for consideration the subject on which he wishes to address the Senate. I would not say one word on this resolution to-day but for the misapprehension of my colleague and the Senator from West Virginia, or which at least their remarks tended to create, in regard to the statements of the public debt. I think that Senators in speaking in this body about a matter in which there is such sensitive interest, not only in the United States of America, but all over the world, as anything which affects the public credit, ought to be extremely careful. Any statements they make affecting the honesty and correctness of our public account touch the public credit as keenly and as widely and as dangerously as any other class of debates had in the Senate of the United States.

When the Senator from West Virginia endeavored to show that there was a difference in the statements of the public accounts in two offices of the Treasury Department to the extent of $100,000,000 a year as to the amount of the public debt, it was a statement which, if left uncontradicted, might tend to impair the public credit; for, if the different branches of the Treasury Department disagreed as to the statement of the public debt by the amount of $100,000,000, there was no reliance whatever to be placed on any statement furnished by that Department, and therefore, even the validity of the public debt, certainly its amount, its character, might be called in question.

Now, sir, there is no ground for that impression, not the slightest. Upon an examination of the tables that are on our desks, upon an examination of the papers furnished and referred to by the Senator from West Virginia, he could by a careful analysis of them have answered all his inquiries; and I should be very glad indeed to have him go in person and examine the books of the Treasury Department and ascertain whether there is any discrepancy of the kind.

I will not follow the line of argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, who undertook to explain, and did very satisfactorily to my mind explain all the apparent discrepancies in the various items of account pointed out by the Senator from West Virginia; but I take the largest of them and will try to show that there is no ground whatever for the allegation made by the Senator from West Virginia in regard to discrepancies. He says in his speech, which I had not the pleasure to hear, that, by examining the Register's reports for 1870–'71, he finds "the statement of the public debt commencing in the year 1862 to be as follows," and he gives the public debt on July 1, 1870, as reported by the Register of the Treasury, $2,480,672,427.81, and then he says also that in the report of 1871, the same year, the public debt is stated as follows in another department of the Treasury, "July 1, 1870, $2,386,358,599.74," making a difference between the two statements of near $100,000,000, a sum so vast that I think a Treasury official would be very apt to think that it was a sum sufficient to be noted. I have sent for and got the two reports which contain these statements, and it does seem to me that if the Senator from West Virginia had read them with reasonable care he would not have pointed out as an inconsistency that which is entirely and fully and in the most ample manner explained in these documents.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will allow me to correct an error into which he has fallen.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would do so, but I do not want to prolong the matter.

Mr. DAVIS. I will not interrupt the Senator except to say that all the figures I have given are from the Register's reports, and not from a different department. I know if you go through the different Departments you will find material differences as well as in the Register's reports; but all the figures I quoted myself are confined to one Department, and that is the Register's.

Mr. SHERMAN. The figures given to us by the Senator from West Virginia are correctly quoted; but you can mislead people very easily, even by making correct quotations from true documents. You must give all the facts, especially when you deal with figures in a statement, in order to present correct results. I refer my friend from West Virginia to the statement of the public debt contained in what is called the finance report published every year. For the year 1870, the year that he has pointed out, I find that this statement covers at least twelve closely printed pages—a statement that gives to the very last details every dollar of the outstanding bonds of the United States, commencing with some bonds issued before the war of 1812, which have not yet been redeemed, and that probably are lost or destroyed. This statement at the end says:

Total principal of debt unpaid June 30, 1870, $2,480,304,797.74.

That is one of the statements quoted by the Senator from West Virginia. This gives only the principal of the unpaid debt, and in a note attached, which was not really necessary, because this statement only deals with the unpaid debt, the officer preparing the statement expressly notifies everybody who reads it that this $2,480,000,000 does not include the $121,429,100 of bonds held as a sinking fund, and which belong to the Government of the United States, but were then uncanceled. If those sinking-fund bonds were added to the bonds that were really unpaid in the hands of third persons, it would make the amount some $2,600,000,000. That is one statement. The other statement is contained in the monthly reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have here for several years. I will take that of the 1st of July, 1870. This statement of the public debt of the United States July 1, 1870, the same date referred to by the honorable Senator, says:

Total debt, principal and interest, to date, including interest due and unpaid, $2,652,283,684.

It gives the total principal and interest to date, and including all the loans that are contained in the book to which I before referred. A general description of each debt is here given, the amounts carried out, the interest computed to the date of the statement, and the aggregates brought forward. These debts are the same sums, the same loans, the same figures exactly as in the other statement. Then from this $2,652,000,000 there are deducted certain items: First, coin; second, currency; third, the sinking fund United States coin-interest bonds; fourth, other United States coin-interest bonds purchased, with interest accrued thereon, amounting to $265,924,084.61; leaving the actual balance due from the United States, including principal and interest, less cash on hand, $2,386,358, 509.74.

There are the figures showing that the debt of the United States, adding interest, taking out the money on hand and bonds already paid, is $100,000,000 less than the principal sum of the debt of the United States. These two statements read by any one are are perfectly consistent, both truthful to the last figure, corresponding to the last cent, and having no discrepancy in them. The difference only is this: that one includes the interest and the other does not; one includes the sinking-fund bonds and the other does not; the one is made by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is master of the money in the Treasury as well as of the accounts kept in the Register's Office. He is the head of the whole, and the Register only of a single Bureau, who from the documents found in that Bureau makes his tables based upon them. Both are truthful; both are consistent. They compare dollar for dollar and loan for loan, one being fuller in detail as to the character of the loans and the amounts due on the loans, and the other as to the interest accrued and funds on hand; but each consistent with the other.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I wish to say about this alleged discrepancy. Here the tables are, and any Senator can examine them. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has criticised the fact that the amount of coin and currency on hand is shown by this debt statement. He is the first person I ever heard criticise that matter. I am inclined to think that the then Secretary of the Treasury introduced an important improvement in the statement of the public-debt accounts, and he did it on April 1, 1869, if I remember aright, and dated the statement back to the year before.

Mr. BOUTWELL. To the March before.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the statements here. There was a debt statement made during your first quarter as to the condition of the debt on the 30th of June of the previous year.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not know but that there was. I had forgotten it, however.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Senators will look at the old statements made in strict compliance with law by Mr. McCulloch, which I have before me—here is one of them, made January 1, 1869—they will be found to contain but a very brief amount of information, simply the aggregate of the principal of the public debt; how many 6 per cent. bonds, how many 5 per cent. bonds, how many currency bonds, &c. Here it is. Senators can read it for themselves. It is a very short and rather unsatisfactory statement.

On the coming in of General Grant's administration Mr. Secretary Boutwell required these statements to be enlarged so as to be fuller, and here they are on an ample sheet, giving not only the amount of 6 per cent. bonds and 5 per cent. bonds, but giving the amount due on every loan; adding the interest up to the time the statement is made, and giving the currency and coin balance in the office of the Treasurer. This was to promote, extend, and enlarge the information of the people, and certainly it is not matter of reproach but a matter of credit.

Mr. President, in regard to the committee to whom this investigation shall be committed, I am perfectly indifferent. As a matter of course, if the Senate imposes this business on the Finance Committee, we shall do the best we can with the subject, but I would much rather that the Senator from West Virginia should be allowed to go and satisfy himself on the subject. It is a matter on which I have no feeling. If the Senate intrust the business to the Committee on Finance, we shall do the best we can.

That there have been some discrepancies in these accounts is not only natural but inevitable. The statements upon which the Register makes his report differ as to time and circumstance from the daily balances furnished by the Treasurer's Office. Every gentleman can see that. Indeed, it is wonderful that the business is done so accurately. Sometimes warrants are issued that do not come in for years; then there are notes outstanding, and no one knows where they are. What has become of them no one can tell. It seems that in one case, in the disbursement of some $4,800,000, $47,000 of Treasury warrants did not come in for three or four years after they were actually issued. That is not strange. Sometimes they are held. It is not at all strange. Therefore the actual expenditures or money paid out in a particular year do not appear on the books to correspond with the amount of warrants issued or Treasury drafts issued, and those issued would not correspond with the amount of Treasury drafts paid, but the outstanding drafts come in from time to time in small amounts, and vary the accounts for each year. Any one can see very readily how that might be. It is not necessary to go into that explanation any further.

The accounts of the Treasury Department have always been based upon the system established by Alexander Hamilton, enlarged from time to time by the growth of the operations of the Government. Instead of one Auditor in the Treasury, there are now six; instead of one Comptroller, there are now three; instead of thirty or forty clerks in the different branches of the Treasury, there are now somewhere from two to three thousand—the amount of business is so enormously enlarged. I have often heard it complained that the system of keeping accounts in some branches of the service ought to be changed, but it is a very difficult and very dangerous process, and I invite the careful scrutiny of any man who undertakes to improve on the work of Alexander Hamilton and Albert Gallatin and all the great men who have filled the office of Secretary of the Treasury, and to devise a better system of accounting than they with their mature minds and long experience established, and which has been enlarged with the gradual growth of our Government. Their system has been the frame-work of our finances for more than eighty years. The gradual additions to the mode of accounting that have been made by law have probably made as perfect a system as can be devised. But he must be a bold man and a wise man who will undertake, without study and experience, to step in and devise a better system than this. If we had such a man, if there is such a one who is willing to undertake the task, I shall be very glad to co-operate with him. I doubt very much the propriety of any tinkering with so complicated a machine as the Treasury Department. Any attempt to make consistent the different accounts of these different Bureaus on the same day would be futile. From the nature of things there cannot be a complete consistency in their accounts at the same moment. Comparison and examination may test their accuracy, but actual similarity would betray them. I think that any attempt of wholesale reform or revolution in the keeping of their accounts would be a dangerous experiment, but at the same time any effort made by any one to explore this Department and ascertain any irregularity, inaccuracy, fraud, or the like, ought to be encouraged. I am inclined, therefore, to vote for the committee asked for by the Senator from West Virginia; but if the majority of the Senate prefer to intrust this matter to the Finance Committee, I will do my share of whatever work is necessary to be done in the premises.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I only propose to occupy the time of the Senate for a moment. I understand that the Senator from Ohio has examined certain of the reports, by which he is enabled to say to the Senate that they agree to a dollar. Before I refer to that, permit me to say that I agree with the Senator from Ohio that nothing ought to be done by this body to injure the credit of the United States either at home or abroad. But I desire to say one other thing which he did not say, and that is that the condition of the accounts should be probed and examined.

Now, sir, I come to what I was about to say with regard to the figures. As I had the honor to say yesterday, my attention was accidentally directed to these discrepancies six months ago. Joining with myself one of the shrewdest bankers in the United States we went through these accounts from 1791 to 1874; we occupied more than three weeks in that examination; and I assert here, notwithstanding what the distinguished Senator from Ohio has said, there is not an accountant in the United States who can take the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Register of the Treasury and the monthly debt statements and tell within $50,000,000 what the amount of the public debt of the United States is. I do not say that my honorable friend, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, may not be able to go into the Treasury Department and report accurately the amount of the public debt; but what I assert is that it cannot be found from the reports that are given to the people. The Register of the Treasury is the book-keeper of the United States, not the Secretary of the Treasury. The Register's accounts ought to import absolute verity; they ought to be absolutely correct. Tried by the public-debt statements, they are not. Tried by the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, they are not. I have not had that conversation myself with the Secretary of the Treasury, but I very much doubt whether the Secretary of the Treasury will to-day say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that the accounts agree in the various departments of the service.

I want to say one other thing here. I have had the honor to serve with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, he as the head of a committee that pays some little attention to recommending the necessary organization of the Departments, and I repeat here what I have said to him, that in my judgment there is not a man in the United States who can take the Treasury Department in its present condition and become perfectly the master of that Department. There are several thousand clerks in that Department. Perhaps it may not be appropriate to state it in this discussion, but in my judgment there should be two other departments. There should be in what is now the Treasury Department three departments; one revenue, one accounts, and one public labor. Then we might possibly find a Secretary of the Treasury who was equal perhaps to Alexander Hamilton. I do not think all financial knowledge died with him. I do not think all financial knowledge became lost when Albert Gallatin died. I desire that the public should know the exact condition of the public accounts, and so does my honorable friend from Ohio, who thinks that he can make the Register's report agree with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. I cannot. I have taken precisely the course that the Senator from Ohio has taken, but I cannot arrive at his conclusion; neither could the gentleman whom I employed to assist me.

I do not agree with the Senator from Indiana in supposing that it is too late to examine into this case. I think it would be proper at this time. Let the committee examine it. I aver, with my friend from Ohio, that I shall rejoice as much as he if the public accounts are found to have been passed upon correctly by the examination of a competent committee. Far be it from me to assert that there has been fraud there. I do not assert that; but an examination is demanded. The condition of the accounts shows that there should be an examination. I do not believe that there is a Senator on the floor of the Senate who is not ready to say that some committee should examine into this matter.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio spoke in regard to subtracting the amount of coin and currency on hand from the aggregate of the debt. I beg to ask my honorable friend from Ohio if the national currency is a debt of the United States that is taken into account at all by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Register of the Treasury? The public debt of the United States consists of its bonds, of its legal-tender notes, of its fractional currency; but the national currency is not a debt of the United States. Yet, as I understand, the present Secretary of the Treasury, and very likely the gentleman who preceded him in that office, takes from the public debt the currency on hand. I beg the attention of the Senator from Ohio to that matter. If I am wrong, very well; but show me that I am wrong. If it is a debt of the United States like a bond, that is one thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to prolong this argument, but I will state to the Senator that the United States owe $370,000,000 of legal-tender notes.

Mr. EATON. I am not talking about legal-tender notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am going to state the case to the Senator. The United States has on hand in its Treasury vaults belonging to it, say, $150,000,000. How much is the United States indebted on those Treasury notes?

Mr. EATON. The gentleman arose to answer my argument. Very well, let him do so, but not by asking a question about a matter I was not talking about and had not under consideration. If he can call the national currency the debt of the United States, let him do so, and then I shall understand him. I have not yet said that the legal-tender note was not a debt of the United States, but I am talking about the "national currency." I hear no reply from the gentleman from Ohio. Therefore in my judgment, from all I can learn in regard to it, by taking into council not a democrat to whom I am to talk politics, but a republican and one of the shrewdest bankers in the United States, it seems to me that there is something wrong in the mode of making up the accounts. I should like the report of a competent committee on this subject, a committee that can go to the root of the matter and let us know exactly the condition of affairs. As we have not Mr. Gallatin, as we have not Mr. Hamilton, let us have somebody else, so that we may arrive as nearly as they did at a correct conclusion.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I only wish to express the hope that this matter will be referred to a special committee and not to the Committee on Finance. That committee necessarily is very much burdened. I hope we shall send the investigation to a special committee, and then we shall doubtless get the information which is sought and all the light upon the subject.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I understand the pending question on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to be whether this inquiry shall be referred to a special committee or to the Committee on Finance. I do not understand any Senator to object to the passage of the resolution itself. Upon the question now before the Senate I shall be governed in my vote by such information as I can get from the Senator from West Virginia or any other Senator who supports his resolution on the point whether he means to charge that there has been any perversion of the moneys of the United States which has been attempted to be covered up by the book-keeping of the Treasury Department, or whether he means to assert that there has been an attempt to make the books of the Treasury Department falsely state the condition of the Treasury of the United States. If the Senator from West Virginia or any Senator who supports his resolution will state here that he has reason to believe that any one has perverted, contrary to law, the funds of the United States and attempted to cover up the transaction by the book-keeping of the Treasury Department, or that any one has attempted to make the books of the Treasury Department falsely state the condition of the public accounts, I will vote for a special committee to examine into that subject, and will render what aid is in my power to ferret out any such fault or crime committed by any one. But if the whole purpose of this resolution is to ascertain whether there may not be some method of simplifying the books of the Treasury Department in the method which has come down to us from the beginning, it is very evident to me that the Committee on Finance is the proper committee to examine into the subject, more especially since we are informed by the Senator from Connecticut that he has devoted three weeks to an attempt to master the whole science of the Treasury and has utterly failed. If that be so, what expectation can we have that there is anybody else in the country who will be able to do it? He confesses himself his own belief that after this experiment on his part there is nobody in the whole nation able to comprehend the subject. I think perhaps the Senator is to some extent correct; and certainly if it is a subject of such intricacy that he cannot understand it after the devotion of three entire weeks to its study, it is better that we should avail ourselves of the experience and ability of the Committee on Finance rather than to trust to some new committee appointed for the purpose.

It is very evident, however, if Senators intend to charge fraud upon any person connected with the Treasury Department, either in attempting to cover up by book-keeping the perversion of the funds or in attempting to mislead the public as to the true condition of the Treasury Department, that for very obvious reasons the inquiry ought not to go to the Committee on Finance. Therefore I think it is due to the Senate and to the country that the Senator from West Virginia should be more explicit here in support of his resolution and should say whether he does charge any fraud upon any person in any quarter in this matter or whether his sole purpose is to ascertain whether there may not be some more simple method of keeping the books of the Department.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts wish me to answer him now or when he shall have concluded his remarks?

Mr. DAWES. I have no choice in that matter. I have listened diligently for three or four days to ascertain that fact as governing my vote on this question. If the Senator desires now to answer rather than to wait until I get through, I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to be willing to yield. Not only the Senator from Massachusetts, but other Senators have attempted, as I have thought, to put words into my month. I have not said yet that there were frauds or that any one had altered the books of the Treasury; but I have said that the statements given to Congress from year to year have been changed. If those statements are not taken from the books, where do they come from? I have said further that in 1870 there was a new table made, called by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] the Secretary's table. I say that table does not agree with the Register's, and I say further that the Register's table subsequent to that period has been made to conform with that new table. Now, from what that new table comes, where the data were got, or how it was made up, no one yet has answered, though the question has been asked several times.

Mr. DAWES. I am quite aware that the Senator from West Virginia has not said that he charged fraud upon any gentleman connected with the Treasury Department in the past. That was one of the difficulties I was laboring under. I am equally aware that he has not said also that he did not charge any such fraud; and the difficulty I labor under is that the Senator and those who support his resolution take special pains to abstain from saying whether they do or do not charge fraud upon those connected with the Treasury Department, and that the purpose of the resolution is to ascertain whether there has been fraud or not. If the Senator will be explicit at this moment and clear my mind upon that point, I shall be at once relieved so that I shall know whether to vote for a special committee or a reference to that standing committee of the Senate which has charge of the matter and has had from the beginning. I will not vote for the reference of this subject, for very obvious reasons, to the Committee on Finance if the honest purpose of the Senator from West Virginia or any Senator who supports his resolution is to ascertain whether there has been fraud or not. I know there is intricacy in the book-keeping of the Department. I have experienced difficulty, as well as the Senator from West Virginia, in times past and have been led into mortifying mistakes because of the difficulty I had in understanding those books; but I believe that the means of detecting mistakes exist there. I desire sincerely to co-operate in some method that will result in simplifying that portion of the books of the Treasury Department that has come down to us from the beginning. There are books in some of the Bureaus of that Department of a later date which are in my opinion remarkably perfect. The books of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, as well as those of the Internal Revenue Bureau, are creations of a later day, for which I think my colleague is entitled to the credit. I refer to the books of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving especially, by which you can follow from the manufactory every piece of paper manufactured for the purpose of printing the bonds or the currency of the country through every stage of its process until it is finally issued upon the country, and trace it at almost any hour of any particular day. But some of the other bureaus follow a method of book-keeping, as has been said by the Senator from Ohio, which originated with Alexander Hamilton. It may be (though I am a good deal discouraged after what the Senator from Connecticut has said) that they can be simplified. I hope they may, and if any committee can be constituted in this body better calculated than any other to ascertain that fact and to bring out a profitable result, it is the Committee on Finance. If, on the other hand, the Senator from West Virginia or any Senator supporting his resolution will say here to-day that he honestly believes there is fraud covered up under the figures of the Treasury Department, I will stand with him and go with him for a special committee that shall probe it to the bottom, so that no guilty man shall escape. But, sir, I hope that he will not abstain longer while pressing the passage of this resolution from informing us whether that is or is not his purpose. I know that he says here is a book the figures in which are so different from the figures that he finds in another book that he is confused and uncertain. So am I; but does not that raise the question which I think the Senate have a right to know, that is, whether he wants a special committee for the purpose of ascertaining and proclaiming to the country a fraud that has been committed upon it by somebody having charge of the books of the Department? I will vote for his special committee if that is his purpose, but I will vote for the reference to the Committee on Finance if the object is simply to devise a more simple and accurate method of keeping the books of the Treasury Department.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont will prevail; and I confess I regretted that the chairman of the Committee on Finance expressed a disposition to vote against the amendment. Next to the liberty of this country its credit is its most valued possession; and credit is always extremely sensitive. Charges have been made here in reference to the manner in which the accounts of the Treasury are kept, which should be coolly and carefully examined. It is the right of the people, without regard to party, to know whether there is this blundering in the Treasury of the United States, a blundering which would be equal, in its effect upon the credit of the country, to absolute fraud; and I hold that it is the right of the people that that committee, best informed, with the most experience, to whom they have intrusted this subject, should investigate it; that the people have a right to the experience of the Senator from Ohio, to the experience of the Senators from Delaware and New York, to the experience of my friend from Vermont, and the recent accomplished Secretary of the Treasury. This subject should not be slurred over. The whole thing should be examined. The mode in which these accounts are kept should be laid open to the people. And I do not believe that there are any gentlemen so well calculated as those who have this experience to give the information to the public.

While I would be most happy to vote with my friend who introduced this resolution, to make him chairman of almost any committee, I am free to say that I do not think the person who makes a charge affecting the credit of this country, who has here repeatedly expressed his decided opinions, whose mind is made up, is the person who is to give the final judgment whether the credit of this country is subject to this charge or not. This is not a question to be treated by the rules of courtesy. The debt of this country is paid by hard labor, by the labor of brawny arms, by the sweat of our working-people, and we are not to stand here and say we will refer the reputation of this country for its credit, for the accuracy of its accounts, to the distinguished Senator who makes the charge impeaching it. I hope the Senate will refer this subject to the Committee on Finance, where it properly belongs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The question pending is the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, which is to strike out the words "a committee of five be appointed" and insert the words "the Committee on Finance be instructed."

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make an appeal in behalf of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] that he may be allowed, as is usual in such cases, to proceed with his remarks. The Senator yielded a while ago supposing that this matter would take but a few moments, and I trust now he will be allowed to proceed. The Senator from Indiana is not in very good health we all know, and I think it is a courtesy such as has never been denied in all cases of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio make a motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I move that the resolution lie over until to-morrow, or remain the unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS. I know it is a courtesy, always extended to a Senator when he desires to make some remarks here, that the pending business be laid aside. I have some answer to make to my several friends who have seen fit to remind me this morning, one of them especially, that I am not the man to be chairman of such a committee as my resolution contemplates. That Senator forgot, probably, that three or four of the gentlemen who have taken an active part in this debate are members of the Finance Committee, and that they have expressed opinions equally as decided as those of the Senator from West Virginia. However, I will not undertake now to reply to any of my friends. I will with pleasure yield, allowing the resolution to be laid aside informally, in order that the Senator from Indiana may proceed, and I think this courtesy is due to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the pending question be informally laid aside for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Indiana to make some remarks.

Mr. THURMAN. That is to be done by unanimous consent, and not by order of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then if the Chair hears no objection the motion will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana is before the Senate, and will be read.

Mr. DAVIS. As the Senator from Indiana wishes now to proceed and will take some time, if it is agreeable I move that my resolution be laid aside until to-morrow morning, and then come up as the regular order.

Mr. THURMAN. If it be passed over informally, it is the unfinished business, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. THURMAN. That gives the Senator from Indiana an opportunity to conclude his remarks to-morrow if he does not conclude them to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1654) to extend the time for claimants under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress to prove their claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 236) to amend section 3767 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the purchase of paper for the public printing; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

PROPOSED MINT AT COLUMBUS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the building and grounds situated in Columbus, State of Ohio, known as the Capital University, proposed to be donated to the United States by F. Michel, of said city, for the purposes of a mint, to be examined for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not said building and grounds are suitable for such mint.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana is before the Senate, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 15th of December, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi for members of Congress, State officers, and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds, violence, and intimidation, whereby the freedom of the ballot was in a great measure destroyed, a reign of terror established, ballot-boxes stuffed, spurious tickets imposed upon voters, so that a popular majority of more than 25,000 was overcome, and in its place was given an apparent but fraudulent majority of more than 25,000; and whereas the Legislature thus chosen will have the election of a Senator to represent that State in this body; and whereas if these allegations are true a great number of the citizens of the United States have had their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States wickedly violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of the said allegations and the circumstances attending said election, with power to visit said State to make their investigations, to send for persons and papers, and to use all necessary process in the performance of their duties; and to make report to the Senate before the end of this session of their investigation and findings.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if the information I have received from very many sources is substantially true, the late pretended election in Mississippi was an armed revolution, characterized by fraud, murder, and violence in almost every form. It was carried on in some respects under the forms of law, but its real nature was that of force, the violation of law, and the trampling under foot of the dearest rights of great masses of men. A little less sudden than those revolutions which have distinguished the states of Mexico and the countries of South America, it did not differ from them in character and was equal in atrocity.

It is a matter of the gravest import to the American people to know whether a large majority of the people of a State have been overthrown and subjected by the minority, and also to understand upon what pretense or principle such a result was brought about. The only thing like principle that could be assumed in justification of such a result would be that political and civil power should belong exclusively to the white race; or upon the other principle, that that party the members of which own the most of the property in the State should be allowed to govern to the exclusion of the majority, who are generally poor and the most of whom have nothing to depend upon for their subsistence but their labor. I apprehend that an investigation of the Mississippi revolution would show that the triumphant minority acted upon both of these principles and in various ways boldly professed them as its doctrines.

We had hoped that a hundred years of national life had definitely settled the question that political and civil rights should not depend upon race or complexion, and that equal rights before the law and in the administration of government should not depend upon wealth or property, but belong alike to every American citizen.

In proposing an investigation it is hardly reasonable to demand that the matters to be investigated should be proven in advance, for that would make the investigation unnecessary; and all that ought to be required should be the exhibition of such probable cause as would justify the Senate, in the exercise of a sound discretion, in ordering an investigation. Investigations have often been ordered by both Houses of Congress upon common rumor and upon general impressions prevailing in the public mind, derived from the press or other sources.

If the belief which is certainly entertained by very many in regard to the character of recent events in Mississippi is not well founded, it is of the greatest importance to the people that an investigation should be had that the truth may be shown, as the material progress and prosperity of the State is deeply involved in such exoneration. I cannot, therefore, understand the opposition to this investigation in any other light than a constructive admission of the truth of the charges which have been made in regard to the means employed in the late Mississippi election, by which the majority was overthrown and the government of the State revolutionized. To shrink from such an investigation unquestionably betrays fear as to the result.

Before proceeding to what I shall have to say about the Mississippi election, I propose to indulge in some general observations.

PROSCRIPTION OF REPUBLICANS BEFORE THE WAR.

Before the war men entertaining adverse opinions to slavery, and whose opinions went no further than opposing its extension to Territories then free, were, to a great extent, deprived of the freedom of speech and of action in the fifteen slave States. Men advocating such opinions were visited with social excommunication, deprivation of business, and threatened and often visited with personal violence. Numerous personal outrages were inflicted in the Southern States upon men who were charged with being abolitionists; and to such an extent was this persecution carried, that in 1856 and in 1860 the republican party was not permitted to nominate electoral tickets or to run candidates for the different offices in ten of the Southern States.

Republicans were not permitted to assemble in convention to nominate candidates, and could not hold public meetings in southern cities and towns without danger of mob violence. Not only were the republicans of the South thus deprived of the exercise of those rights which are the dearest to American freemen, but the republicans throughout the North were made to feel that they were substantially banished from nearly one-half of the States in the Union; that to them those States were almost a foreign land, and in some respects worse than a foreign land. I remember the personal humiliation I felt, which was aggravated by the fact that while republicans were excluded from fifteen States in the Union they were taunted with this exclusion as if it were a crime on their part. They were constantly denounced as the sectional party. I felt, as we all did at that time, that the hand of slavery was resting heavily upon us. This denial to men of republican sentiments the free enjoyment of their opinions and exercise of the ordinary forms of political action was a wanton and gross violation of the natural and constitutional rights of millions of people, and was bitterly felt and deeply resented. That this state of things should have ended in war was not to be wondered at; for that sentiment which denied to republicans the exercise of their dearest rights afterward hurried the South into rebellion.

HOW WHITE PEOPLE ARE KEPT OUT OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Man is a social being, and there is no disaster from which he shrinks so much, not even that of personal violence, as exclusion from the society of his fellows. The fear of that exclusion demoralizes men, and often causes them to sacrifice their principles and their honor. But the persecution against republicans went beyond society and extended to their business; as merchants, they were not patronized; as physicians and lawyers, they were not employed; as farmers, they were denied those kindnesses and courtesies that belong to every neighborhood, and constitute the chief attraction of agricultural life. We had hoped when the war was over that this state of things would have ceased.

But, sir, we have grave cause to consider the question whether it is not the policy of the democratic party of the South, in which the democratic party of the North concurs, not only to defeat the republican party of the South, but to extinguish it. We have reason to believe, and do believe, that there is a large body of white people in every State of the South, comprising many of the most wealthy and intelligent, and largely comprising that great middle class upon which the future hopes of the South depend, who entertain republican sentiments, and would vote and act with the republican party but for the dread of bringing upon themselves and their families social ostracism and destruction to their business. And thus a large body of white people have been kept out of the republican party, and, at the same time, their absence from that party has been charged upon it as a crime. It has been said that the party was composed almost entirely of colored people, with an additional few thousands only of whites in each State.

Political power has thus been thrown into the hands of the colored people to a much larger extent than it otherwise would have been, and a large and intelligent body of white people who would have acted with the republican party, and who would undoubtedly have had the control of its affairs to a great extent, have not only been excluded from the party, but compelled to act with the democratic party. To this condition of things the members of the republican party can never consent, having due regard to their rights as citizens of the United States and to their personal honor and manhood. They cannot consent in silence to be excluded from nearly one-half of the States of the Union. All they ask in the South—not as a favor, but as a right—is that they shall be permitted to enjoy equal rights and privileges upon like terms with other people. They do not ask that those entertaining democratic sentiments shall vote for republican candidates or indorse republican doctrines. No such thing. Members of the democratic party have a perfect right to vote for whom they please—to vote for confederate instead of Union soldiers, but what we ask is that if any portion of the southern people, whether they are carpet-baggers, so-called, or were born in the South, entertain republican sentiments they shall be allowed to vote and act with that party without being subjected to these unusual and terrible punishments.

LET MEN AND WOMEN BE TREATED ACCORDING TO MERIT.

They ask that every man in the community shall be received and treated according to his merits as a man. If he is a bad man, be he republican or democrat, let him be treated as a bad man; if he is a good man, be he republican or democrat, let him be treated as a good man. Let not his rights in society or in business be determined by his political opinions, but by his conduct and character as a man. That is all we ask, that he shall not be punished socially or in business; that there shall be no dread or fear of personal violence on account of the assertion of his opinions. When that takes place, so far as I am concerned, my warfare is ended. When the amendments to the Constitution guaranteeing equal rights shall be accepted by all and enjoyed by all, and when colored men in the South and white republicans shall be treated according to their merits as men, then reconstruction will have taken place. Reconstruction cannot take place at northern junketings or gushings, but it must take place in every town, village, and neighborhood in the South, by giving to men of all political parties their equal rights and letting them enjoy the privileges of society according to their merits as men and women.

This exclusion of men from society and from business because of their political opinions is intimidation of the worst character. It does not differ in principle from actual personal violence. It is even more dreaded than personal violence by brave men, who often defy it and assert their opinions in spite of it; but when it comes to punishment not only falling upon themselves but their families, when they are to be isolated and their means of livelihood taken away, many shrink back and surrender.

POLICY OF STARVING NEGROES INTO THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The leagues which have been formed in the South not to lease land to colored men, and thus to turn them out of their homes and to refuse to employ them because they voted the republican ticket, may not be in violation of any law for which any legal punishment can be inflicted; but it is wicked in principle, infamous in practice, and strikes at the very foundation of republican government. It destroys all freedom of election, and is a form of violence not inferior in its effects to any other that may be employed. It presents to the colored man the alternative of starvation or the support of the democratic party, and is no less cowardly than wicked. That many of the most distinguished officers of the confederate army after the war was over were disposed to accept the situation, to accept the amendments, and to act with the republican party, is beyond dispute; but when any one of them came out and announced his purpose he was in almost every instance met with a storm of indignation and abuse and threatened with social punishment from which many of them shrank back. Men who never flinched upon the field of battle have quailed and turned back from the pitiless storm with which they were threatened. The case of General Longstreet may be referred to. He was one of the most distinguished officers in the confederate army. He was regarded by many as not even second to General Lee; and, when he declared his intention in Louisiana to act with the republican party, was denounced as traitor, ingrate, coldly passed by in the street by many of his companions in arms, and the doors of life-long friends shut rudely against him and his family. At that time he was engaged in a prosperous insurance business, and had not asked and did not desire any appointment from the Government. But his business was destroyed in a single day, and this caused the President, unasked, to tender him the position of surveyor of the port of New Orleans.

General Longstreet, in giving the history of the affair, as I am informed, states that before he announced his purpose to act with the republican party he consulted with Generals Hood, Beauregard, and many other confederate officers, and they had agreed with him that it was their duty to accept the situation, to sustain the constitutional amendments, and give their support to the Government; but after he had taken the step, and the storm of persecution and calumny had burst upon him, the others retracted their purpose, and some of them refused to speak to him.

The question seems now to be presented whether the republican party, who while constituting the majority of the armies of the Republic during the war could not be driven from the Southern States, shall now be expelled from them in time of peace. That the republican party has committed blunders I do not deny, and very many people have been led to believe that one of its chief blunders was in permitting through the legislation of Congress those who were lately in arms against their country to return prematurely to the enjoyment of civil and political rights and again to fill the Halls of Congress for the purpose of legislation. That the party has acted in granting amnesty with a liberality which has no parallel in history is not to be questioned, and it is but a poor requital for that liberality to attempt by any means to exclude it from the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges in the Southern States.

DESTROYING THE CHARACTERS OF THOSE WHO JOIN THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Many southern men who had joined the republican party, and whose personal character had before been unimpeached, were at once covered with obloquy and shame, until it came to be understood that to join the republican party would cost a man his character and the peace and happiness of his family. When the war was over, the mass of the thinking and intelligent people of the South were profoundly disgusted with those leaders and politicians who had hurried them into rebellion and overwhelmed them with the misfortunes of war. The rebellion in its origin was so insane, and turned out to be so utterly destitute of sense, that the best men of the South turned away from its authors with horror, and were satisfied that the peace of the country hereafter could only be secured by the administration of the Government upon the principles of the republican party; and I believe to-day that but for the exercise of the influences to which I have been referring there would be a majority of the people in Georgia, Virginia, and perhaps in every Southern State, acting with the republican party, and that the colored people in their participation in politics would have the benefit of the intelligence and experience of a large part of the best white people in those States now acting with the democracy.

INTIMIDATION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY BY ITS VIOLENT ELEMENTS.

And this leads me to another consideration, and that is, that the intimidation to which I have referred, whether of social and business ostracism or personal violence, has operated almost equally upon the democratic party. There is a large part of that party in every Southern State, I believe a majority of it, who do not approve of the acts of violence that have been committed; who do not approve of the social violence which has been practiced; but they have in some way been restrained from the assertion of their opinions and have been powerless to correct these evils. That there is an element of violence in the Southern States, which I believe is in the minority, that has controlled them since the war as it did before the war, I have no doubt. That a majority of the people of Virginia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Alabama, Louisiana, and perhaps other States, were opposed to secession and rebellion I have always understood; but the lawless, the aggressive, and active portion of southern society were in favor of secession, and by various instrumentalities drove the other part of the people into its support, and that element which brought secession upon the South I believe has controlled the politics of the democratic party chiefly since the end of the war. The term "scalawag" is one of opprobrium and is applied almost indiscriminately to every man of southern birth who has joined the republican party, and is often more offensive in its application than that of "carpet-bagger."

THE APPLES OF THE DEAD SEA.

The colored people are fiercely denounced for their ignorance and want of moral training, and their condition, which is in many respects unhappy, is imputed to them as a crime. It must be admitted that slavery was a bad training school, not only intellectually but morally. The cruel and inhuman laws which made it a penitentiary offense to teach a colored child to read and write have borne their fruits, which have like the apples of the Dead Sea turned to ashes upon the lips of those who enacted them. It is written that the sins of the fathers are visited upon their children unto the third and fourth generations, and it is not in the providence of God that the inventors of those laws should entirely escape their consequences. I would that the cup of bitterness could entirely pass from the white people of the South; but that is not possible under divine economy. Those who practiced African slavery for two hundred years cannot hope to escape all the evil consequences resulting from it.

THE MURDER OF COLORED MEN DEEMED UNIMPORTANT.

It is the merest folly longer to deny the atrocities that have been committed upon the colored people in the Southern States. The evidence is found in thousands of depositions taken before investigating committees, in the continual revelations by persons coming from the South, and in the current statement of hundreds of newspapers, although there is reason to believe that not half, perhaps not a tithe of the outrages, are ever brought to the attention of the public.

They have been hunted like wild beasts, and the white sportsmen went gunning for them. If that many white men had been murdered by the Indians the whole country would have demanded vengeance, and a large portion would have clamored for the extermination of the savage tribes. When some twenty starving and desperate Modocs murdered General Canby and three of his colleagues, the Government never stopped until the last man had been killed, or captured, tried, and hung. When the Virginius, notoriously engaged in an illegal and hostile expedition against the Spanish government, was captured by a Spanish cruiser, and some fifty of the crew tried by a court-martial and shot, the Government demanded immediate reparation, and threatened Spain with war in case it was not made. When some six years ago an American boat was fired upon and two men wounded upon the coast of Corea, our fleet demanded reparation; and when it was not granted, battered down the forts and slaughtered nearly three hundred of their soldiers. When Mexican robbers make a raid across the border into Texas and steal five or six hundred cattle, the depredation is tenfold magnified, the Government of the United States is urged by many to go to war with Mexico, and at least to place the Army of the United States along the Rio Grande for the protection of the property of the people of Texas; but when a hundred negroes are murdered in cold blood it is considered a small affair, unworthy of the attention of the Government, and not even justifying an examination. One difference is, perhaps, that the cattle can be sold and the negroes cannot.

THE STALE LIES ABOUT NEGRO PLOTS.

The infamous lies about negro plots to murder the white people have become exceedingly stale and disgusting. Last summer the columns of the Southern Associated Press for days groaned with the stupid and clumsy story that the negroes had conspired to murder the white men and the ugly white women of Georgia. That this infamous lie was intended as a pretext for a slaughter, there is but little doubt. If apprehensions of these uprisings ever existed, they grew out of the conviction of intolerable wrongs inflicted upon the colored people, and are another proof of the truth of that saying, "conscience doth make cowards of us all."

Every year before the war there were stories of plots among the slaves to "rise" and murder their masters and families, which I believe in every instance turned out to be false, but were often made the pretext for the greatest cruelties.

There is a class of newspapers in the North not professedly democratic, but really so, that for several years have done everything in their power to blacken the character of southern republicans. They have denied, justified, or excused every persecution and outrage that have been heaped upon them. They have jeered at their complaints and sought to cover with ridicule and calumny every man who has dared to lift his voice against these horrible atrocities.

The peaceable conduct of the colored people of the South during the war in remaining upon the plantations and working with their usual industry, while their masters were in the field fighting for the professed purpose of perpetuating slavery, has been the subject of world-wide consideration and surprise. Their general behavior since the war, and often under circumstances of great trial and oppression, has been remarkable for its pacific character and for their failure to take into their own hands vengeance for the enormous wrongs they have suffered. Nothing could be more infamous than the attempts which have been repeatedly and, in fact, constantly made to justify the atrocities committed upon them by alleging that they themselves had conspired to rob and murder the white people, and had themselves provoked and begun the different conflicts in which they have suffered so greatly. The conclusive answer to these foul calumnies is founded in the fact that colored men only are killed; that if white men are killed they are few in number, and the cases are exceptional.

While the masses of the colored people of the South are uneducated, they are far from being destitute of natural sagacity, are well instructed in the lessons of experience, and possess far greater intelligence than their enemies give them credit for. They know full well that their enemies are trained in the art of war, possess the best quality of arms, are skilled in the use of them, and are daring and aggressive, and that in any conflict that may ensue themselves must be the greatest sufferers. They know full well that their interests lie in peace and in the observance of the laws.

DUTY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY TO MAINTAIN THE RIGHTS OF COLORED MEN.

While it is the duty of all men to maintain the equal rights of the colored people, that duty rests with peculiar force upon the members of the republican party. It was the republican party that abolished slavery, made five millions of people free, and this alone is the grandest achievement in the history of any political organization. It was the republican party that elevated the colored people to equal civil and political rights and gave them a share in the administration of government, and thus placed them in a position to be assaulted by those who believed in the rightfulness of slavery and that colored men should not, under any circumstances, enjoy civil and political rights.

If, after having thus placed the colored people in this position of trial and assault and exposed them to the dangers to result from disbelief in their natural rights, their mental and moral capacity, and the hatred of their race, the republican party should become tired and so act that their enemies can say that they admit that the brief experiment of negro freedom and suffrage is a failure, it would deserve the execration of men and, I doubt not, receive the punishment of Heaven. It seems that there are political dandies who have nominally professed belief in the equal rights of men, who now think it is the genteel thing to abandon the colored people and to join in the crusade against them by professing a high regard for good government in the South, and that the further consideration of their rights and remonstrance against their wrongs should be eliminated from political discussions, which should be confined exclusively to questions of currency, tariff, civil-service reform, and other economic subjects.

Should the republican party of the North become indifferent to the fate of the colored people of the South and ignore the atrocities committed upon them, nothing can prevent them from sinking rapidly into a state of vassalage, and their last condition will be worse than the first. That the democratic party of the South are reconciled to the civil and political equality of the colored people is contradicted by their every act, by their daily life, by their history in the past and their aspirations in the future; and when they get the physical power—regardless of constitutional provisions or congressional enactments—they will hurl them from the platform of equality and reduce them to a vassalage but one remove from slavery.

WHITE-LINE POLICY.

The white-line policy adopted by the democratic party in Mississippi and other Southern States proceeds upon the idea that the Government should be exclusively in the hands of the white people and that colored people should be excluded from all participation therein. One excuse given for this is that the colored people had adopted a color-line, by which they sought to gain exclusive control of the government in Mississippi and other Southern States. This charge against the colored people is utterly and flagrantly false. So far from having ever sought to establish a color-line and to take to themselves exclusively the government of Mississippi or other Southern States, they have continually disclaimed it, and by their conduct proved the sincerity of their disclaimer. They have always been anxious to act in concert with white men; and, although in Mississippi and other Southern States the number of white republicans acting with them has borne but a small proportion to their own number, they have given to the whites constantly a majority of the offices. The fact that the colored people have not joined the democratic party and entered the ranks of their bitter enemies is most absurdly, even foolishly, offered as proof that they have attempted to establish a color-line in politics. Had the colored people joined the ranks of their implacable enemies they would indeed have proved themselves to be the stupid and incapable beings they have constantly been represented. The white-line policy was established by the democratic party immediately after the termination of the war, and has never been relaxed or abandoned for a single moment. Occasionally a resolution has been put forward in some convention renouncing that policy, but only for a blind to cover up more desperate designs. The first Legislature elected in Mississippi after the war, under the government established by President Johnson, enacted a black code which for satanic ingenuity and malice has never been exceeded in any country.

The democratic State convention in Mississippi, in February, 1868, adopted the following resolution as a part of its platform:

Resolved, That the nefarious design of the republican party in Congress to place the white men of the Southern States under the governmental control of their late slaves and degrade the Caucasian race as the inferiors of the African negro is a crime against the civilization of the age which needs only to be mentioned to be scorned by all intelligent minds; and we therefore call upon the people of Mississippi to vindicate alike the superiority of their race over the negro and their political power to maintain constitutional liberty.

The white-line policy here adopted was the legitimate descendant of the black code of 1865, and the revolution of 1875 was but a continuation of the fight against the principles of reconstruction and the constitutional amendments. I here quote a passage from the Meridian Mercury of last fall as a fair reflex of the spirit of the democratic press in Mississippi and other Southern States, as I shall show by numerous extracts hereafter:

But the white man won't come down to the level of the negro's conception of politics in this or any other sort of government and the negro can't come up to the white man's, and there's an end of it. There is no use in all this sort of palaver, which fools nobody that has sense enough to be fooled. The reconstruction which put the white man and negro on the same political level with the white man put him in a competitive antagonism which must and will last until the negro steps down and out, or until his northern friends step in and rescue him from his perilous position and restore him to his normal relation of dependence and subserviency when in close contact with that superior race which never yet acknowledged an equal but of the same blood. "Unite politically" the two races never can. Political equality is an absurdity without an equality of intelligence and the governing virtues of the whole people. In the end a political unity will be first enforced, and then the political rights, which had to be controlled because dangerous, will be destroyed.

Whatever disguises may be temporarily adopted, whatever protests may be made in Washington, the inflexible purpose of the "white-line" democracy of the South is the destruction of the political rights of the negro.

VIOLENCE BEFORE REPUBLICAN RULE.

But it is said that the violence and intimidation practiced in Mississippi and other States have been the natural result of republican misgovernment and the corruption of public officers in those States. That there have been misgovernment and corruption is not to be denied, and that it has been grossly exaggerated for partisan purposes is equally undeniable; but that this corruption and misgovernment have been the origin and cause of the personal violence and social intimidation is utterly untrue. This violence and intimidation began with the end of the war, and, as I have shown, existed before the war; it preceded any attempt upon the part of Congress to reconstruct the Southern States; its most fearful outrages in some of the States took place before republican State governments had been formed or while republican government was yet an experiment. The infamous Ku-Klux organization began as early as 1866, and practiced its most fearful atrocities in South Carolina, North Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana during the years 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871.

The horrible slaughter at the Mechanics' Institute in New Orleans in 1866, where two hundred and sixty men were killed for no other crime than attending a convention, was while that State was still under a government that had been organized by President Johnson. As a report of a congressional committee shows, within sixty days before the November election of 1868 more than two thousand men were killed and wounded in Louisiana for political causes, bringing about a change between the State election in May of that year and the presidential election in November of more than 70,000 votes!

General Sheridan, who had been carefully gathering up the statistics of the number of persons killed and wounded in Louisiana since 1866 and up to February 8, 1875, on account of their political opinions, reported to the investigating committee appointed by the House last winter the number, so far ascertained, as follows:

Killed	2,141
Wounded	2,115
Total	4,256

This is a greater number than fell at the battle of Bull Run, and with another difference, that in that battle the slaughter was not all on one side.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, chairman of the congressional investigating committee, in his report made to the House last winter, briefly recapitulates the history of the murders and atrocities in Louisiana and presents a sickening detail of horrors that dwarfs into insignificance any Indian war that has occurred within a century. The horrid massacres at the Mechanics' Institute, at Colfax, at Coushatta, to say nothing of those of lesser magnitude, relieve those at Wyoming and Schenectady of their historic prominence and throw over the butcheries of the Modocs a mellow light.

The report of Hon. John Coburn, from the Select Committee on Affairs in Alabama, submitted to the House at its last session, presents another chapter of horrors a little less bloody than that of Louisiana, but partaking of the same general character. The murders, raids, cruelties, and proscriptions practiced upon the republicans, both black and white, read like a chapter in the Moorish history of Spain. These reports, sustained by a vast body of testimony taken by committees on the spot, are to be found in the printed volumes on the shelves of your library, and may be inspected by any one who doubts the truth of the description which I have given.

VIOLENCE IN 1868.

The evidence taken by the reconstruction committee of the House, of which Mr. BOUTWELL, now a member of this body, was chairman, in regard to the election in Mississippi in 1868, presents the bloody and fraudulent antetype of the election last fall. It reeks with murder, frauds, proscriptions, intimidation, and shows that the new constitution of that year was rejected by the same infamous instrumentalities by which the revolution of last fall was enacted. The bloody record shows that the white-line democracy of Mississippi, who now would have the country believe that they have been patient and long-forbearing, but were finally aroused to uncontrollable anger by the oppressions and robberies of a republican State government, in 1868 hoisted the same bloody flag, bearing like inscriptions, under which they marched to a victory won by the same weapons. The pretense that they had borne with republican robberies and oppressions until forbearance was no longer possible, and had resorted to intimidation and violence only when no other remedy was left, is a falsehood, the monstrosity of which is only equaled by the audacity of its presumption upon the ignorance or forgetfulness of the nation; and I shall show hereafter that all the real grounds of complaint which they had against republican State government in Mississippi were trivial, almost contemptible, when compared with the wickedness and enormities which distinguished the government of that State while in the hands of the democracy before the war.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE.

The report made by the joint committee of the two Houses of Congress on southern outrages, appointed in 1871, through Hon. John Scott, then Senator from Pennsylvania, presents the history and operations of the Ku-Klux organization in Mississippi, South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Florida in a picture so fearful and revolting, that the reader turns from it with the sickness of the heart. It is a tale of hundreds of brutal murders, of deeds without a name, of inhumanities and oppressions upon the innocent, defenseless, and ignorant, that will challenge the annals of crime in any age or country.

When we read this dreadful record we reflect that the vengeance of God cannot sleep forever. The statesman who says that he is so absorbed in the study of political economy that he has no time to attend to these great issues of life and death and is weary of these tales of horror and suffering makes the same answer Cain made to the Lord when he was asked, "Where is thy brother?" and Cain answered: "I know not. Am I my brother's keeper?" And the Lord said: "What hast thou done? The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground."

To punish such crimes the enforcement act was passed in 1871, which of course could not apply to offenses already committed, but under it nine hundred and thirty persons were indicted in the United States courts in Mississippi. Of these two hundred and forty-three were tried and found guilty, and the cases against three hundred and eighty-two persons are still pending. In North Carolina 1,849 were indicted. Of these 518 were tried and found guilty, and cases are still pending against 742; in South Carolina 1,186 were indicted; in Florida, 24; in Alabama, 536; in Georgia, 235; in Tennessee, 73, and in Kentucky, 30; in all, 4,865.

The passage of the enforcement act and the prosecutions under it had the effect to break up the Ku-Klux organization throughout the South, and gave comparative peace and security in several of the Southern States for two or three years. The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by the President in nine counties in South Carolina had a magical influence, and many of the most desperate men in that and other States immediately ran away, some of whom have but recently returned. The white-liners of that State, yielding to the only principles they recognize, force and fear, suspended their operations, and have only recovered their courage since the revolution in Mississippi, which they are now declaring it is their purpose to repeat and make the basis of their canvass in 1876. Social proscriptions and punishments were never more powerful and relentless than before the era of reconstruction and the years immediately succeeding; and it is an unanswerable fact that these outrages and horrors have not been inflicted upon the thieves and robbers, for they generally had democratic partners, but upon the innocent, the defenseless, and the ignorant.

ALLEGED MISGOVERNMENT NO EXCUSE FOR MURDER.

But if the misgovernment and corruption had been all that has been represented, what justification or excuse would they constitute for the violence and murder that have been committed? None whatever. If they be admitted to constitute a justification or even a substantial excuse, that admission would be fatal to the existence of republican government. Misgovernment and corruption have not been confined to the Southern States since the war. The darkest page in the financial history of any State in the Union is to be found in the repudiation by the State of Mississippi of her public debt many years ago, at a time when no republican or abolitionist could set his foot in that State without danger of being hung upon the next tree. It cast a deep shadow upon American integrity throughout the world, and is to-day as vivid in the memories of men as if it had occurred but yesterday. No similar instance can be found in our history of equal demoralization and degradation of the public conscience of a State. There has been foul misgovernment in Northern States under democratic administration; and we have witnessed in the city of New York, that stronghold of the democratic party, a depth of corruption and fraud comprehending many millions of dollars first dragged to light by republican agencies, and the chief criminal has recently been permitted to escape in open day by the connivance of democratic officials. But these enormous public robberies, which had been believed to exist for years before final exposure, were never dreamed of as an excuse for violence and murder.

But it seems never to have occurred to those who attempt to justify these wrongs upon the score of republican misgovernment in the South that the proscriptions and violence that have been practiced there are in themselves calculated to beget corruptions and disorders in government. Where men are persecuted, not for their crimes but for their opinions, and are made outcasts from society and the common enjoyments of life, they have but little inducement to be honest, and the temptations to fraud and corruption are increased tenfold. It is the lesson of history in every age that, where men are treated as villains and vagabonds and subjected to wicked oppression from society because of their race, religious or political opinions, they are sometimes thereby made villains and vagabonds.

NO FAITH IN VIRTUE THAT CONNIVES AT MURDER.

I have no faith in that virtue which assails with fury fraud and corruption, but connives at murder, outrage, and oppression. Those who make daily outcry about frauds, larcenies, and defalcations, but turn a deaf ear to the cries of murdered men, to the shrieks of victims upon whom are inflicted infernal outrages, to the complaint of those who are driven from their homes and made outcasts from society for no other crime than their race or political opinions, are pharisees and hypocrites of the basest sort. Frauds and larcenies are infamous crimes, and deserve the execration of all men; but they are inferior in enormity to the crime of murder. The taking of human life, save in self-defense, is the wickedest deed under heaven and among men, and the murderer need not be expected to hesitate at the commission of any inferior crime. He will commit perjury, forgery, arson, or any other act by which he may cover up, justify, or excuse his dreadful deed. We have seen how the pretended abhorrence of public corruption has been made a pretext for murder, for the establishment of a reign of terror, for driving men from society, depriving them of their means of subsistence, and robbing many thousands of people of their dearest political rights. If there is anything more odious than these crimes, it is that reeking hypocrisy which affects to stand aghast at fraud while attempting to cast its mantle of concealment and protection over deeds the most dreadful and infamous.

THE GREAT QUESTION.

The question of amnesty, which has recently excited so much attention, is interesting as a matter of justice, of feeling, and of example. The national question of paramount interest is the political, social, and industrial condition of the South, the violation of the political, civil, and social rights of millions of people, and the subversion of the will of the majority by violence and intimidation. We stand in the presence of a great danger overhanging the Southern States, in which those of the North are powerfully and, I may say, equally interested. In many of the Southern States the policy is openly avowed of seizing all power into the hands of the white race, and depriving the colored people of their political and civil rights. With this policy, commonly known as the white-line, it is believed the democracy sympathize in every Southern State, and I fear to a considerable extent in the Northern States. State after State has been conquered from the majority by violence, and we are no longer left in doubt as to the purpose thus to establish a solid South in the interest of the democratic party, and when they shall have obtained the control of the National Government to reconstruct the Southern States upon the white man's basis, and to destroy the republican party by making it impossible for men of republican principles to enjoy and express their opinions in peace and safety. Then, as before the rebellion, the republican party will be banished from the South, and it will be to them as a foreign country. When we consider how fearfully rapid the progress has been in that direction even under republican administration, we can understand how it might be accelerated and consummated with a democratic President elected chiefly by the southern democracy and necessarily sympathizing with them in their aspirations. Lest it be said that I do injustice to the northern democracy, I beg leave to remind the Senate that before the war the northern democracy not only connived at the oppressions upon the republican party and its exclusion from the Southern States, but made merry over and defended the outrages committed in the South upon abolitionists; and that now, and ever since the war, the democratic party either deny, justify, or excuse the dreadful atrocities committed upon the white and black republicans in the Southern States.

PERJURY THE CONCOMITANT OF MURDER.

A necessary concomitant of the system of murder, violence, and proscription in the Southern States is falsehood and perjury. The men who commit these crimes will, as a matter of course, commit perjury to conceal or justify them. In the Ku-Klux investigations and trials the most wonderful and disgusting exhibitions of perjury were witnessed. Many men who had before the Ku-Klux Committee or on examination in court as witnesses testified to all want of knowledge of the organization or of its crimes were afterward conclusively proven to be members of it and guilty. The victims of their infamous crimes were covered with the foulest calumnies, and scarce an outrage was investigated that was not denied under oath or justified or excused by the most infamous falsehoods against the sufferers.

A monstrous system of falsehood has been continually practiced, not only in Mississippi but in every Southern State, by which the Government of the United States is constantly charged with the grossest and most wicked oppressions of the southern people. Republican State and county governments are assailed with charges of corruption and oppression which in most cases are utterly false or grossly exaggerated. Many very ignorant people in the South have thus been made to believe that they are sorely oppressed by the Government of the United States, and that it is, as charged by a distinguished Mississippian, now a member of Congress, the most tyrannical government on the face of the earth; and yet if they were called upon to specify in what way they have suffered, they could not do it, even if their lives depended upon it. The charges of corruption against Governor Ames and every republican State and county official in Mississippi have been so voluble and persistent that very many of the ignorant have been made to believe them, and have thus to some extent been hounded on to madness and crime.

THE ONLY HIGHWAY TO PEACE.

Many well-meaning people deplore any reference to the outrages committed in the South as inimical to reconciliation and harmony between the sections. They are exceedingly anxious that in this centennial year all past differences shall be forgotten, and the people, North and South, forgetting and forgiving, and mindful only of our great national future, shall meet and embrace as a nation of brothers. It is a consummation devoutly to be wished; but I must remind such well-meaning people that any formal reconciliation, while the dearest rights of millions are systematically violated and the greatest wrongs passed unnoticed and unpunished, will be the rankest hypocrisy, revolting alike to divine and human justice. It is only the knavish quack who puts a plaster over the mouth of the wound and says it is healed. The healing process must begin at the bottom and be thorough to be permanent and healthy. All gushing and handshaking which precedes the concession of equal rights and justice to men of all colors and opinions in the Southern States will be the veriest sham and deceive nobody. Such foul wrongs cannot be ignored and concealed. They will forever obtrude themselves upon the world and cry aloud for redress. It will be the cry of "Peace, peace; when there is no peace;" and should the republicans of the North turn a deaf ear to the complaints of the republicans of the South and affect to believe that reconstruction has taken place, and that all is well, they will be justly contemptible in the eyes of mankind. The Union men of the South have been subjected to trials of which we in the North have but a faint idea, and have shown their faith and patriotism by adherence to their principles under circumstances where the weak, the venal, and the unprincipled have joined the enemy; and the republicans of the North dare not, will not now abandon them. Let me say to this class of people, and to the men of the South, there is but one highway to reconciliation, and that is open, straight, and free; and over its portals are inscribed these words, "EQUAL JUSTICE TO ALL; TO ALL THE EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS;" and if the southern people will walk in that highway they will arrive at the temple of peace and find unbroken rest.

Mr. President, I shall not be able to conclude to-night, and I would prefer going on in the morning.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 19, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

APPROVAL OF JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no corrections, the Journal of yesterday, as read, will be regarded as approved.

Mr. FRYE. I notice by the reading of the Journal that it is there recorded that "Mr. FRYE was authorized to present the views of the minority of the committee" on the judiciary "in writing." That was in relation to a proposed amendment to the Constitution relative to the term of President and Vice-President. What I was permitted and authorized to do was to present a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires the Journal to be changed as he has suggested it will be done. The Chair would suggest, however, that the present order amounts in parliamentary effect to the same thing. The views of the minority may be in the nature of an amendment or otherwise.

Mr. FRYE. Then I do not care anything about it.

The Journal was approved as read.

RECIPROCITY WITH HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. TARBOX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to consider and report the proper legislation to carry into operation a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, on the subject of commercial reciprocity, concluded and signed at the city of Washington on the 30th of January, 1875, by their respective plenipotentiaries.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The bill (H. R. No. 1254) introduced by me yesterday, to provide for the establishment of a branch mint of the United States at the city of Kansas, in the State of Missouri, was erroneously referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, instead of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which all bills of that character introduced at this session have been referred.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the reference of the bill will be changed as indicated by the gentleman.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SPECULATIONS IN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BLAND, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Whereas speculators have been and still are procuring by fraud and otherwise the assignment and transfer to themselves of the lands allowed as additional quantities to Union soldiers to make up the amount of one hundred and sixty acres in railroad limits and other privileges secured by acts of Congress approved June 8, 1872, and March 3, 1873; and whereas it is the policy of the Government that those rights should be held for the sole and exclusive use of said soldiers, and no transfer or assignment thereof to speculators be permitted: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the honorable Commissioner of Lands be requested to inform this House whether such transfers have come to his knowledge, and what rulings have been made thereon; and whether any other or further legislation is necessary to prevent such transfers and protect said soldiers from frauds in this behalf.

WIDOW OF HON. JAMES BUFFINTON.

Mr. CRAPO. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, directed to cause to be paid from the contingent fund of the House to the widow of James Buffinton, deceased, late a member of this House, a sum equal to the amount of his salary as a member of this House from the date of his death to the 2d day of November, 1875; and that the Committee on Appropriations be authorized to insert a clause for this purpose in the deficiency bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand that there is any necessity for the last clause of this resolution as to an appropriation. I suppose the money is already appropriated. But the reference of the subject is of course proper.

There being no objection the resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twelve o'clock and twenty-three minutes. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DURHAM. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 704) to extend to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York, the privileges of section 2990 of the Revised Statutes, have come to the conclusion that it properly belongs to the Committee on Commerce, and have therefore directed me to move that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws have also directed me to move that they be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 136) to amend section 840, chapter 16, title 13, Revised Statutes of the United States, and to move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which it properly belongs.

The motion was agreed to.

VICE-CONSUL GENERAL.

Mr. DURHAM. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws have directed me to report back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1208) to correct a mistake in and amend section 4130 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read. It provides that section 4130 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by inserting, after the words "consul-general," the words "vice-consul general;" so that the section shall read as follows:

SECTION 4130. The word "minister," when used in this title, shall be understood to mean the person invested with and exercising the principal diplomatic functions. The word "consul" shall be understood to mean any person invested by the United States with and exercising the functions of consul-general, vice-consul general, consul, or vice-consul.

Mr. DURHAM. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of State which accompanied a draught of this bill. The office of vice-consul-general, which was named in the original statute, was (evidently by inadvertence) omitted by the revisers. The Secretary of State says it is very important to have this omission supplied, because frequently the consul-general is absent, and under the existing law the vice-consul-general cannot act in his place. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of State be published in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 12, 1876.

SIR: In section 4130, title 48, of the Revised Statutes, relating to the jurisdiction of diplomatic and consular officers in certain countries in civil and criminal cases, it is provided that the word "minister," when used in that title, shall be understood to mean the person invested with and exercising the principal diplomatic functions, and that the word "consul" shall be understood to mean any person invested by the United States with and exercising the functions of consul-general, consul, or vice-consul. The act of Congress of June 22, 1860, to carry into effect provisions of the treaties between the United States, China, Japan, Siam, Persia, and other countries, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls or other functionaries of the United States in those countries, and for other purposes, which was in force prior to the Revised Statutes, provided in section 22 that the word "consul" should include, in addition to the officers above-named, also vice-consul-general.

It will be observed that the omission of vice-consuls-general from the list of those consular officers who may perform judicial functions is an important one. In the absence on leave of the consuls-general charged with judicial functions, or in case of a vacancy, or of inability from any cause to perform their functions, there is no qualified person upon whom the judicial duties may devolve. Cases involving considerable interests are frequently brought before the consular court at Shanghai, Kanagawa, and Constantinople; and it is understood that at the two former offices there arises a greater or less number of cases involving small offenses which require the presence of the consul-general daily in his court. In view of these circumstances, I have the honor to recommend to your committee that the Revised Statutes should be amended so as to restore vice-consuls-general to the list of those officers who may discharge judicial duties; and to this end I inclose for consideration a draught of a bill which will, it is believed, accomplish that object.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. MILTON J. DURHAM,
Chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws,
House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEXAS BORDER TROUBLES.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I am instructed by the Special Committee on the Texas Frontier Troubles to report the following resolution, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Special Committee on the Texas Frontier Troubles be authorized to employ a clerk.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

ENLISTED MEN DETAILED ON SPECIAL-DUTY SERVICE.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to this House without delay the number and names of enlisted men of the United States Army employed on extra or special-duty service in the District of Columbia during the year ending December 31, 1875; and that in this report he give the particular duty or employment, and the total compensation, including the value of rations and allowance of every description received by each enlisted man so detailed or employed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (S. No. 236) to amend section 3767 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the purchase of paper for the public printing; when the Speaker signed the same.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) to amend the Constitution, and move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

The Congress shall not pass any local or special laws in any of the following-enumerated cases; that is to say, for—

Granting pensions, bounties, lands, or prize-money to any person or persons, or for correcting the records of any department of the Government in reference thereto;

Granting relief to any person or persons or authorizing the payment of any claim against the United States or any officer thereof, except appropriations in general laws to pay the judgments of courts or commissions authorized by law;

Remitting fines, penalties, or forfeitures, creating, increasing, or decreasing fees, percentage, or allowances of public officers during the term for which said officers are elected;

Granting to any corporation, association, or individual the right to lay down railroad tracks, or amending existing charters for such purpose by confirming any special or exclusive privilege upon such corporation or association which it does not already have;

Granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, subsidy, immunity, or franchise whatever;

Regulating the practice of courts or conferring special jurisdiction in a particular case on any of the courts of the United States, or commissions for the auditing of claims against the same.

In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted, and in all cases the courts may determine whether any special law could have been embraced in a general enactment.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the introduction of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] but unless we have some change in the rule as it stands at present I must hereafter object to any such unanimous consent as that which he asked for. The only way to get rid of an obnoxious rule is to insist upon its rigid enforcement. The practical operation of the rule as it stands at present in reference to the introduction of resolutions on Monday makes it next to impossible for the members from one-half of the States in this Union to offer resolutions for action. Now, Mr. Speaker, as you are a member of the Committee on Rules, I desire to call your attention to this condition of affairs. In order that the members from all the States may hav an opportunity at least once during the session to offer resolutions the rule as it stands at present needs some modification. I dislike very much to stand in the way of gentlemen bringing in resolutions by unanimous consent, but if the Committee on Rules neglect to report some modification of a rule of the House so as to put all members upon an equality, I must hereafter, as I have already said, object to granting unanimous consent to any member for the introduction of a resolution out of its order.

The SPEAKER. It is the clear right of the gentleman from Iowa to make such objection whenever his judgment commends that kind of action to him. But he ought to know that the Chair has no power to change or modify the rules of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The honorable Speaker is a member of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. But that gives him no power to change the rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It gives him power, however, to report.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Iowa desires to have the rule changed or modified, it will be proper for him at the proper time to introduce a resolution to that effect and have it referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There does not seem, however, to be any proper time, as the State of Iowa is hardly ever called.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. J. H. BAGLEY] desires to make a brief explanation touching a vote given by him the other day.

Mr. RANDALL. On what subject?

The SPEAKER. He desires to make a personal explanation concerning a vote, on the yeas and nays, given by him the other day.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. It is in reference to a vote given by me on the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] concerning the resumption of specie payment.

Mr. RANDALL. If it is an explanation in reference to the vote on amnesty, I must object.

The SPEAKER. It was the vote on the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on the subject of the redemption of the legal-tender notes.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I am recorded as having voted for the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to suspend the rules for the consideration of his resolution. If that was my vote, it was made under a misapprehension of the nature and bearing of the resolution, and I desire to have it changed. I desire to go before my constituents and the country as in favor of the resumption of specie payments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that it is too late to change his vote; but the gentleman's explanation will stand against the vote.

ADELBERT C. FASSETT.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1338) for the relief of Adelbert C. Fassett; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MORRIS S. FARRINGTON.

Mr. MILLER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1339) for the relief of Morris S. Farrington, a son and heir of March Farrington, a soldier in the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I submit for adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts hear it read?

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to its being read, but the Speaker has ruled that we cannot object after that.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Centennial appropriation bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 96, noes 7; no quorum voting.

The Speaker, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. WILLIS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 140, noes 9.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOOD, of New York, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I shall not consume much of your time. I desire very briefly to state why I think this House should vote for the centennial appropriation.

I do not believe there is a man in this House who will deny that our Government is fully committed to this celebration. Under authority of an act of Congress the Executive of the United States has invited the governments of foreign nations and the people of those nations through their governments to be present. Those invitations have been accepted by nearly all of them. Appropriations have been made, according to the different modes of those nations, to meet the expenditures involved and to do their share toward it. Having therefore invited this co-operation and expenditure on their part, it would certainly be a very remarkable circumstance if our Government declined to give any aid to the enterprise itself. The appropriation will do as much for the character of the centennial as the money will do. Should we adopt a less liberal policy—and I have no fear of it—we need not be surprised if foreign nations take less interest in it and do less for it. We have gone into this matter, and it behooves us to see that it is done decently.

The design of making it, as far as practicable, self-sustaining was a good one. Three-fourths of the amount to be expended will come from private and state enterprise and liberality. The remainder we are asked to give. I think that, under the circumstances, we get off cheap. It is only three and a half cents apiece. Where is the person who refuses to give it? As a general rule our political festivals are sustained purely by popular movements. Estimates for bunting, barbecues, and fire-crackers do not appear in our budgets. Our average Fourth of July celebrations do not need them. John Smith, Sam Jones, and Jonathan Edwards resolve themselves into three committees, on invitations, rhetoric, and eatables, and forthwith the "occasion" is a grand success. This international centennial cannot be done in that way. This is the boiled-down essence of all the Fourths of July for a hundred years. It is not all for ourselves. We have inspired our people with love for the national air on the martial fife and drum, and the reading of the Declaration of Independence has been like the voices of the lively oracles. Now we throw the gates wide open to all the world. We invite them to see our growth and prosperity; to study the theory and examine the practical working of a government of the people. If it is worth celebrating at all, it is worth doing it well. Uncle Sam knows the value of a cent exactly. He is waxing rich and strong because he knows it. He expects us to study that matter very closely, but he also expects us to remember that he was never mean about it. He will wear his traditional white hat, but he will brush it when he cocks it among the nations. He has invited all creation, and while he has demanded prudence from us, he will not thank us for parsimony. He feels that he owes this to his place in modern civilization and owes it to the downtrodden of all the earth.

I think there is probably not a man within the sound of my voice who does not believe that if we refuse this appropriation the exhibition will not be the success that I am sure every American desires it to be. If we make this appropriation, it is important that we do it at once. In a hundred days our guests will begin to come.

Nor do I believe that city rivalries or jealousies will enter into this. We could not all be born in Philadelphia; but Uncle Sam was born there. He staked off his first claim around that old hall. In that hall, a hundred years ago, a handful of brave men met to cast the die of our national fortunes. Their circumstances were full of embarrassment. There was but little more than three millions of people in all the colonies. They were without resources and comparatively without credit. They scarcely knew how far they would be sustained in what they did. They confronted one of the mightiest empires on earth. There they uttered the Declaration of Independence, and a nation was born. They did far more. They did higher and better. Unawed by power and unchecked by conservatism, they uttered the grand old words that ring in our ears from happy school-boy days and which sent a thrill through the heart of struggling humanity all over the world: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that God created all men equal." It was not a "glittering generality." It declared that in the Government then formed all men should be equal in the eyes of the law.

We can look back, my friends. Look back over that hundred years. We can see the ship of state rocked in many a storm. We can remember, not without a tear, the brave men who died for it, and the wise men whose whole lives were given to developing the genius of the American Government, whose lives, founded on principle, are as illustrious as a martyr's death. We can recall those grand old words, and here, in this noontide of the nineteenth century, with the picture of the saved and redeemed Republic before us as it is to-day, rising in freedom from the clouds of war, we can wipe the perspiration from our brows and modestly and reverently thank the Lord that, even if it took a hundred years, we were able to "hew to the line" these brave old patriots "scored" for us.

Mr. DE BOLT. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. DE BOLT. I see by the bill before me that it is provided that the Government shall not under any circumstances be liable for any debt contracted by the centennial board. That same clause was enacted in the act of 1872 incorporating the centennial board. In last Congress they asked for only half a million dollars. Now they ask for a million and a half. Suppose now they overbuild their means, or use up their means and go in debt; who is to be responsible for that debt hereafter? Or can the gentleman give us any assurance that this board will not be here next Congress asking for another appropriation to pay the debt that they have contracted?

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I will reply to the gentleman's question. It is competent for the next Congress to do that which it is competent for this Congress to do, and they will do what they please, whatever we may say in the premises. I know it is customary to insert in bills what shall not be done hereafter, but the gentleman from Missouri knows as well as myself that Congress can do it if they please. This bill, however, provides that they shall have no equities in any future claim. As has been said, this bill provides that the United States shall not be liable for any debt of the centennial commission or the centennial board, and that is all we can ask.

Mr. DE BOLT. They claim that they cannot complete the buildings without this appropriation. Suppose in the next Congress they say that they have completed their buildings but have gone beyond their means?

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. They estimated for three millions in the last Congress, and now they estimate for a million and a half, and a guarantee is given that the Government shall not be responsible for any further amount. As I said before, if this centennial celebration, this gathering at Philadelphia, will do anything to cement the bonds of the Union, it is cheap if it cost all the gentleman might fear it would cost. But I think there is no danger of any further appropriation.

I do not know that I should say anything about the influence of this celebration in cementing the bonds of union and fraternal feeling, and yet I feel sure that it will do it. Is there a man on this floor who does not believe that these are the things that bind the bundle of rods together. And if it does so, it is a wise appropriation. The nation that has spent four millions a day in war can afford a million and a half once in a hundred years to render civil wars impossible. Those who lately sought to destroy the Union know that they made a mistake; but they are high-strung, like the rest of us, and of course do not want to be eternally reminded of it. I shall not, therefore, dilate on it. We will go up to Philadelphia. A cluster of old memories will come back to them, dear to them and to us, and when the martial fife and drum strike up old Yankee Doodle on that centennial morn, we will meet them there; and there, recurring to first principles, there, on the altar of Union and freedom, we will together swear eternal fealty to the grandest government God ever gave to the children of men.

Mr. HARRISON. It is said, Mr. Chairman, by some of the members on this floor who have opposed this appropriation, and by that portion of the press which opposes it, that this House cannot vote for it without stultifying itself; that by the vote recorded on the 14th of last month we have committed ourselves against all subsidies and against this measure. For the purpose of placing ourselves right, I wish to remind gentlemen, and to remind the press of the fact, that when that resolution was here to be voted upon a distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts asked the question if that resolution would or would not cut off the centennial appropriation. The same question was asked by other gentlemen around me, and by myself among the number. The distinguished mover of that resolution, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] distinctly stated that he did not consider the word "subsidy" in that resolution as covering the centennial appropriation. Therefore it does not bind us. We voted for that resolution with a reservation in favor of the centennial appropriation—not a mental reservation, but an outspoken and a loudly spoken reservation. And I hope to show in the course of my remarks that this appropriation is not a subsidy, but is a compliance with the implied obligations of the Government when it invited the world to become its guests, and to assist in this the first hundredth anniversary of our national existence.

It is said, too, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a national undertaking; that it is a private scheme, gotten up by a corporation in Philadelphia. To a certain extent it is private. Scarcely any great act of government is ever originated otherwise than through some private individuals. If a great public building is to be erected to accommodate officers of the Government in New York, in Saint Louis, or in Chicago, what is everybody's business is no person's business, and the proposition is never acted upon until some interested parties, parties who wish to get a contract or to sell a site, bring it before Congress. It is true that this matter was brought before Congress by individuals from Philadelphia. But it was in answer to an expression of feeling that was as widespread as our Union itself that some great national rejoicing was befitting the people of America in the centennial year of its existence. They came here and suggested an exposition at Philadelphia. It was readily conceded that Philadelphia was the fitting spot in which to hold such an exposition. Philadelphia was acknowledged to be the cradle of American Independence and the place where it should be held. But, Mr. Chairman, from that moment this undertaking became purely and strictly national. Congress named it, Congress gave it its very birth. It declared what its objects should be. Congress declared who should be its officers, and one branch of the Government, the President of the United States, named those officers. Those officers have to report to the Government of the United States all that is done. They are liable to the Government of the United States for any mismanagement on their part. They are liable to this Congress by impeachment should they be guilty of malfeasance. The President of the United States was directed by a law of Congress to invite the world to this our first great national jubilee. He did invite them. But gentlemen say here, as was said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] Congress, when it made that law, put in a proviso that there should be no more money expended by the National Government; that it should not be liable for the debts of this corporation. Was that embodied in the invitation that General Grant sent abroad to the nations of the world? Was that proviso incorporated in the invitation to come and assist us in this glorious, this grand undertaking to show the world our appreciation of the great boon our forefathers had handed down to us? Of course not. It is true that we as citizens must follow the maxim that every man must take cognizance of every law enacted by the proper law-making powers. But foreigners have no such obligations attaching to them. They received our invitation. They have answered that invitation. Russia has donated $700,000 to aid its citizens in being represented in this international exposition. People of all nations are coming. But the gentlemen who undertook to act as the agents of the Government and to provide for the entertainment of the nation's guests find that owing to the panic of 1873 they cannot raise the funds to complete the necessary buildings and to open the exposition in a fitting manner. They therefore appeal to Congress. They show us that they have wasted nothing; that there have been no leakages; that their inability to complete their preparations is no fault of theirs.

And yet we whose glory it should be to celebrate this great event, we whose glory is to be exhibited to the world, cannot make an appropriation of a little more than twice the amount which the autocratic government of Russia has made to enable its subjects to appear among us with their goods and their wares and to help us succeed in this enterprise. We invite the world to our feast; and now we are told we must have the President issue his circular to the people of other nationalities to inform them that, owing to a proviso in the law, we cannot spread the cloth or uncover a plate; that they must bring their lunch-baskets with them; that they must be prepared to pay a dollar for those things they buy at home for less than half the sum; that they can pay their money and take their choice of what they find; that the centennial buildings may be without a roof; that we are very sorry, but it cannot be helped, for we have found a constitutional objection to a further compliance with our implied agreement when we invited them to our feast, that is, to give them at least decent entertainment.

I ask this House shall the United States occupy this position?

Sir, this undertaking was from the beginning national; it is national. But it is said that it is carried on and to be carried on by a private corporation. That corporation, sir, is a creature of the Government; it is a corporation born of governmental action; officered by the Government, commanded by the Government to do certain things, empowered by the Government to do certain things. It is nothing more nor less than the agent of the Government. And we, by the fact that we made it a corporation, did not for one moment rob ourselves of the right to claim all the glory and all the praise if this great undertaking shall be a success.

Sir, Congress may have commited an error in giving this enterprise so national an aspect; but it is too late now to recede. It has told the world that this was our mode of celebrating our hundredth birthday. The world understands that it was for this purpose that enterprise had its origin. We cannot now undeceive them without national dishonor. We have reached the middle of the stream. It is too late to swap horses.

The President has invited foreign nations to take part in it; the people of foreign nations have responded. Year before last, in 1874, I had the pleasure of spending several months traveling in Germany, in Austria, and in the Tyrol. Although I speak the language of those people but indifferently and mingled with them only as an ordinary traveler, I do not think I exaggerate when I say that I must have spoken with more than one hundred who intended to come to our international exposition at Philadelphia. They were not poor and homeless emigrants, but they were men of means and intelligence, men who intended to come here and visit the exhibition, and when that visit was over they hoped to visit and see other parts of America. They advised with me as to the places they might possibly visit within a given time. Last summer I was again abroad. I was in Denmark and Sweden, and again in parts of Germany. I found that a wet blanket had been thrown over this whole thing. Men told me that they did not intend to come; that the American people were too niggard to make an appropriation for the purpose; that the enterprise was descending into what would be simply a private and local affair. The impression was being made upon them that this undertaking was purely local and would not be worth visiting. Let this appropriation be passed, and if it shall pass this evening, by to-morrow morning the lightning's tongue will carry the information to Europe, and a great impetus will be given to the tide of visiting strangers.

Is there not a great good to be attained by these people visiting us? I would state here that the calculation is that not less than twenty thousand people will come to this exposition from foreign countries. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWETT] has stated, the tide will be limited only by the accommodations afforded by European steamers. Each man coming here will bring a large amount of money with him, if I may use so ungenerous an argument. There is no doubt that they will spend in America several millions of dollars, not poured into the lap of Philadelphia alone, but scattered over the whole country. But, as I said, that is an ungenerous argument. But just here I will make an argument which to me is of great importance. These are hard times. The people are suffering for bread, although our granaries are bursting with plethora. The people are without money, although our bank vaults are loaded with idle currency. Why, sir, is this the case? Because confidence has fled from the land; men of means are groaning under their load of idle capital. And why, sir? Because they have lost confidence in their fellow-men. This exposition, this national jubilee will bring people together from all parts of the land. It will open the hearts of the rich; it will bring them face to face with their fellow-citizens. It will re-open trade all along the great lines of railways. It will put idle money into circulation. The people will for the moment forget hard times, and in that very forgetfulness confidence will be begotten. We have millions of money. All we want is to put it in circulation. It is believed this Centennial will go far toward this end.

There is a higher argument than that. We all want to be brought into closer communion with foreign nations. When the mists have been lifted which now veil the forms of the stranger, as the gentleman from Philadelphia has so eloquently said, when speaking of our southern friends who were but lately our enemies, we will stand face to face, not only with our southern brethren, but with foreigners of every clime, and will feel that they are all men and brothers.

They will come here and learn something of our great country. Gentlemen who have spent much time abroad will understand me when I say that the ignorance of foreigners in regard to our Government, our society, and our affairs is remarkable. Talk with them about our great country, speak of the length of our rivers, and they are struck with amazement and surprise. They are amazed at the great distances from one place to another in America. They are surprised at the huge dimensions of our inland fresh-water seas. By bringing them here we spread a knowledge of our country, make them better friends, and more disposed to trade with us in the future and to mingle with us at all times.

It is true that we here think that Europe should understand our affairs as well as we understand theirs. But we must remember that Europe has furnished the area on which the great drama of history has been enacted. We read its history and are familiar with its scenes. But America is to Europe almost a terra incognita. By bringing them here to this exposition we enable them to see our country for themselves; we will awaken in them an interest in our affairs and thus bring them into a closer communion with ourselves.

We are told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] that these are hard times; that we have no right to put our hands into the pockets of the sons of toil and take from them their hard earnings. Sir, the population of the United States is estimated to be forty-five millions. This appropriation is for $1,500,000. Distribute this sum among the people per capita and it will amount to the enormous sum of 3½ cents each.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. My argument had no reference to the financial condition of the country. I am very thankful to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] and also to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] that they have given us the advantage of their computation that this appropriation will be but three cents a head for the population of this country. I would remind them, however, that there was another gentleman, a former member of this body, a gentleman from Massachusetts, but not here to-day, who made a computation to the effect that the salary grab amounted to but three cents a head for the population of this country, or the price of a postage-stamp, he inclosed to it to the party complaining of the grab, and the people permitted him to remain at home. I advise the gentleman to heed the lesson.

Mr. HARRISON. The cheapness of the salary grab, or any reference to the Credit Mobilier, does not make that right which of itself is wrong. But it affords an answer to the gentleman when he speaks of the money this appropriation will take from the hardy sons of toil. This $1,500,000 divided among the voters of this country would make sixteen and two-thirds cents each. Does any one believe for a moment that if the voters of America could be appealed to they would hesitate to put their hands into their pockets and donate sixteen and two-thirds cents each to this great undertaking?

But, says the gentleman from New York, the rich men should do it. The rich men, who have made fortunes out of our bleeding country, should do it. But, sir, the rich men do not do it. The rich men among his own constituency, who revel in wealth, who wallow in untold fortunes, they do not do it.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman will permit me to say that the citizens of New York City subscribed some $240,000 more than has been subscribed by the rest of the nation together.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well for New York; but New York should have subscribed all the balance, rather than have had this enterprise fail.

Mr. WILLIS. It will.

Mr. WIKE. I understand the gentleman to say that this appropriation was excluded from the resolution against subsidies, which passed the House by so large a majority.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman is mistaken. I said this, that Mr. HOLMAN himself said that he did not suppose that resolution covered the Centennial appropriation. The gentleman will see it is so if he will read from the RECORD.

Mr. WIKE. Did not the gentleman vote for that resolution himself?

Mr. HARRISON. I did, with a reservation.

Mr. WIKE. A mental reservation?

Mr. HARRISON. No; an open-spoken reservation.

Mr. WIKE. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House in the present condition of financial affairs of the Government no subsidies in moneys, bonds, public lands, indorsements, or by pledge of the public credit should be granted by Congress to associations or corporations engaged or proposing to engage in public or private enterprises—

I want now to call the gentleman's attention to the closing words of this resolution—and that all appropriations from the public Treasury ought to be limited at this time to such amounts only as shall be imperatively demanded by the public service.

Now I want to ask my colleague what connection this appropriation has with the public service?

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman will allow me I will show that, at least to my mind, there is an imperative demand for the appropriation. But let him read a little further from the RECORD and see what Mr. HOAR said.

Mr. WIKE. Mr. HOAR said: "I should like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to inform the House whether he intends to cut off the appropriation from the Centennial?" And Mr. HOLMAN answered: "I do not suppose it is covered by the word 'subsidies,' although I should be willing to have it so construed."

Mr. HARRISON. By a wonderful recollection I have quoted it correctly.

Mr. WIKE. I have read now to accommodate you. Allow me to put my construction on that resolution now.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman will have an hour hereafter.

Mr. WIKE. Mr. HOLMAN simply says that this appropriation was not covered by the word "subsidy;" but he does not undertake to say that it is not covered by the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit that my colleague will have time to make a speech himself.

Mr. WIKE. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. HARRISON. I know he is my friend, but he is tied up just now by constitutionality. His patriotism to-day is tied up in the greenback. [Laughter.]

Mr. REA. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I really cannot allow gentlemen on this side of the floor to interrupt me in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] will proceed without interruption.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe I was talking, when interrupted, about the cost of this thing. I said that it would cost to each voter in the United States sixteen and two-thirds cents. I believe that I asked the question, if the voters of the United States could be called upon would they refuse to make this donation? It is said that this celebration ought to have been a celebration made by the people as such. If there is no doubt that the people would have been patriotic enough to donate three and one-third cents and that the voters would have been willing to have donated sixteen and two-thirds cents, then it strikes me that it is our duty to collect from each person three and one-third cents, or, if preferred, sixteen and two-thirds cents from each voter, in the most economical manner. If each man, woman, and child in the country should send three and one-third cents to the finance committee of the Centennial by letter, it would cost $1,350,000 in postage-stamps to get this pittance into the hands of the Centennial managers. If each voter should send sixteen and two-thirds cents, it would cost $270,000 for postage alone, besides the time spent in going to and from the offices. It would have made the cost of the machinery of collection twice as large as the appropriation itself. If therefore we believe that the people of the United States are sufficiently patriotic to answer the demand of the Government that they should celebrate the one hundredth anniversary in the way the Government proposes, then we are doing the best thing possible to enable each voter to draw upon the people's bank, the Treasury of the United States. If, on the other hand, the people are not patriotic enough, then indeed is it time that we should do something to arouse again the spirit of patriotism which once burned in our land, but which has been deadened by the civil war and by the great attention of our people to the making of the eternal dollar. Sir, the power of a free country is in the patriotism of its people. In a despotism the king cares not for the patriotism of his subjects. All he asks is willing obedience and enduring muscles. But with us it is a different thing. Sir, there are two kinds of patriotism. One is mixed with selfishness; it has its origin in the knowledge of the protection given the citizen by the flag of his country, and the ability afforded him by its institutions to acquire material wealth and material comforts. And there is a patriotism unmixed with selfishness; it is that blind love of country which knows no reason for its existence; that love a man feels for his native land because it is his native land, and because his forefathers have lived in it and their ashes mingle with the soil he treads upon. He loves his country because he breathes its atmosphere, and because he knows that when his race is run he will lie down in its soil, and his ashes will be mingled with the ashes of those who have gone before him.

He loves it because his children will be gathered to his side by those who in their turn shall follow them. He wants that they shall all lie down and sleep in one common bed. Sir, this is emotional patriotism, it is sentimental patriotism. It is that feeling which nerved the army of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. It fired patriot hearts at Valley Forge. It is the feeling which, when "God save the Queen" is struck up by voice or by band, makes an Englishman rise and uncover himself, and with glowing bosom thank Heaven that he is a Briton. It is the feeling which makes a Frenchman, in the midst of festival or in the midst of combat, join in the Marseillaise with almost frantic enthusiasm.

When an invader crosses the frontier of the Tyrol that feeling lights a thousand beacon-fires on a thousand hill-tops, flashing as it were by magic, as the stars peep out of the firmament when the sun drops behind the western horizon; it is the feeling that makes the poor Tyrolean when he sees that fire gleam leave his earth-floored hut or his poverty-stricken chalet, seize his rifle, place himself by the side of the eternal mountains, making his body a bulwark of the house of Hapsburg as impassable as is the mountain itself.

These men of the mountains are not actuated by any feeling of interest. There is no dollar-patriotism in them. They have no fields waving with grain; they have no noble dwellings. They are poor. They love their native land because their homes are hidden in its sequestered glen or are perched on the mountain-side. They love it because it is their home and because all their songs have been songs of father-land.

This emotional patriotism is born of love of locality; and is as instinctive in the generous breast as is the love for woman to the boy when the down of manhood first darkens his lip. Like the boy's love it may be frittered away by licentiousness, poisoned by internecine strife, and deadened by inordinate greed of gain. It is nourished by legendary tales and by songs of glory. It is fed on mystic words, as Magna Chartar and Runnymede; on legends of Tell and of Marion. It is painted on the retina of the soul by panoramas of Bunker Hill and of Yorktown, and of Washington buffeting with the waves of icy Delaware. It is kept alive by national pomps, by national games, and national holidays. It is fired by anniversary drum-beats and cannon-booms, by Fourth of July orations replete with patriotic hyperbole.

Sir, this feeling is one that we should cultivate in America. It was this that enabled our forefathers to fight through eight long years of dreadful carnage, suffering every privation, knowing not what privation was when they felt that their country called upon them. But to-day we are wrapping up all that glorious feeling in the folds of a piece of money less than a greenback—a smaller piece of currency than the fractional currency is yet divided into, so that we must mutilate the smallest piece of that currency to get at the amount—the amount of three cents and one-third of a cent.

Sir, I do not believe in this thing. Let me read what was written by John Adams nearly one hundred years ago. On the 3d of July, 1776, the Declaration of Independence having been resolved upon the day before, although it was not signed until the day after, John Adams—one of those men born of "the days that tried men's souls," one of those men who, if this had been a pagan land, would have adorned this Hall by statue or by bust, and would have been reverenced by us as one of our demi-gods—John Adams wrote to his wife in these words:

But the day is past. The 2d day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epocha in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires, and illuminations from one end of this continent to the other from this time forward, forevermore.

You will think me transported with enthusiasm; but I am not. I am well aware of the toil and blood and treasure that it will cost to maintain this Declaration and support and defend these States. Yet through all the gloom I can see the rays of ravishing light and glory.

This man was deeply read in historic lore, and had pondered well its lessons. He was deeply read in the human heart; he knew what sort of soil that human heart was; he knew, if neglected, it would grow up in brambles and weeds, while, if cultivated, it would give forth fruit of the finest character. John Adams wrote this not simply in a spirit of prophecy; he wrote it to be a lesson to all time. He knew how patriotism had been nurtured in days gone by in olden Greece by Olympic games; in Rome by pomps and shows and triumphful processions; and he wanted it so done to-day and hereafter in this country. Sir, in after-years John Adams was not ashamed to make Fourth-of-July orations—orations which, if uttered to-day, would be sneered at as spread-eagle speeches. Would to God there were more spread-eagleism in the land than there is. Our Fourths of July have become unmeaning holidays, for boys to fire off crackers and to throw up Roman-candles. Orations in praise of our glorious land are rarely heard. It is to be hoped this centennial year may be the commencement of a new era; that this great jubilee at Philadelphia may cause to be hatched a new brood of American eagles, to be spread in succeeding years.

Think, Mr. Chairman, of the difference between now and 1776. A common eagle, extending his flight from the extreme eastern limits of civilization to its western limit in 1776, would have made that flight in one single day. To-day the proudest monarch of the forest, lifting himself from the Atlantic and looking to the sitting sun, ever intent in sailing onward, days, ay weeks, will have passed before he shall be able to cool his wearied pinions in the spray of the Pacific; and yet we are afraid of making a centennial precedent of celebrating the glorious boon handed down to us by 1776. Sir, ninety-two years ago, when the first anniversary of the Fourth of July was celebrated after the acknowledgment of Independence, when the gun first belched forth upon the eastern slopes of Maine at sunrise that the day of our national birth had come, as in the sun's rapid flight across the continent gun after gun was heard, in less than one hour the last gun was heard on our western limits, and was echoed by the crack of the red man's rifle, and the war-whoop of the Indian was the chorus to the orator's patriotic words. What is it to-day? When the sun shall rise on the Fourth of July next and shall gild the hill-tops on the Saint John's and the boom of the cannon is heard announcing the one hundredth birthday of our existence, as the sun shall roll on in his march of a thousand miles an hour and gun after gun shall catch up the detonation of the last gun, the national anthem will swell, and, as it goes westward until reaching a line stretching from the far north to the extreme south on the Gulf of Mexico, one grand peal shall be heard, a peal of a thousand guns, rocking the very foundations of earth, echoed to the blue vaults of heaven, mingling its tones with the songs of the stars as they roll in their musical spheres. Ay, sir, that tone, that grand national anthem, rolling over a land teeming with population, rich in all that blesses man, will take nearly five hours going from our eastern to our western limits; and yet we cannot vote three and a quarter cents each of the people's money for a celebration of the magnificent boon our forefathers have given us!

Sir, they say it is unconstitutional. I could if I had time convince any man that it is according to the very spirit of the Constitution. Sir, the Constitution made our Government. When it formed it, it made it with certain incidents of government, incidents which belong to nationality. A very incident of nationality is to preserve itself, to glorify itself among nations, to give expression to its pride of existence. One of these incidents is to nourish the heart of our people as we nourish its brain. Sir, what right under the Constitution had we to erect this magnificent pile here as the nation's Capitol? Brick and mortar would have warmed us as well—would have protected us as well in summer and winter; but when we stand at the foot of this hill and look at yonder magnificent Dome, cutting the blue vault of heaven with its rounded brow, we feel proud of the country, proud of the land of which it is the type and emblem, and our citizens when they come here tell us not of any waste of money. Yet that Dome cost many millions.

Sir, what right had our forefathers to fill that panel there to the right of your chair with the picture of the Father of his Country? The right was incident to government, to erect statues and to paint pictures commemorating our glorious heroes—men who gave their time and wasted their fortunes for our benefit. When sitting here and our minds are clouded with any ignoble thought, let us look at that calm face and remember that no sordid thought ever stained his mind, and then every groveling desire will be exorcised from our heart. What right had we to put that picture, Mr. Chairman, to your left? He was the friend of America; there was no other right than the right incident to our nationality to reward this friend of our country—a man who came here when we were struggling for independence, came in the name of his king. It stands there a memoria technica of international obligations. When in this Hall we feel disposed in our power to snatch from a weak sister republic her lands and appropriate them to ourselves, he stands there and bids us remember what we owe to foreigners. When in the greed and lust of party power we are asked to take advantage of the internecine strife of a sister-government, when Spain is rocked by wars and we are asked to rob her of her brighest jewel, Lafayette stands there and tells us to remember our duty to those who have gone before us, and to remember that golden rule, "We should do unto others as we would they should do unto us."

Mr. Chairman, we decorate the graves of our soldiers. Is it under the war power? Do the bones and ashes of our soldiers fight? No, sir; it is an incident of nationality itself. It is our duty, not simply our right; it is our duty to give a resting-place befitting the heroes who gave their lives for us. We do so at Gettysburgh; and we are not told we are doing an unconstitutional thing.

When Ireland was starving and stretched her meager hand across the ocean and pleaded to America for bread, did we cry out, The Constitution prevents? No, sir; we sent ships freighted with corn. And Ireland was grateful and happy.

When that late Egyptian scourge came like a blighting cloud from the Rocky Mountains, sweeping from Nebraska and Kansas everything that was green, and the people in distress appealed to Congress for assistance, it gave them raiment and bread, and gave them seeds. Under the Constitution? No, sir. O! no. But under the right that belonged to us as an incident of nationality, believing that we were made in the image of the Eternal Jehovah, to be kind and generous to those who were cast in the like mold with ourselves.

Sir, these acts have been done since the beginning of the Government, and yet we are told that this will be a precedent in the future. Ay, sir, let the watch-dogs of the Treasury tremble, we are going to vote this centennial appropriation, and in 1976 our act will be quoted against us. We shall all then have been gathered to our fathers. Our children even will not be alive. Nothing now living born of women will be then in this House. I may be mistaken, Mr. Chairman, when I look upon the brow of the present occupant of the chair, around which are clustering the eternal snows of winter to keep it forever fresh. I feel it is possible that he may be sitting here in 1976. My friend from West Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] whose words of wisdom I heard years ago, seems to know no creeping of time. He may be living here in 1976. I give him the benefit of this precedent, and I hope that if he be here then, when this country shall number a population of 150,000,000, he will quote our acts to-day, and will vote an appropriation to make a celebration that will cause the very welkin to ring from one end of the country to the other.

Sir, some of my friends are afraid of their constituents. They say they would like this bill to pass, but they cannot vote it. I am not afraid of mine. Chicago, midway between two oceans, in less than one short half a century springing from nothing into the Queen City of the West, knows no jealousy of Philadelphia. She remembers that when the fire-fiend swept over her and her palatial structures and her comfortable homes were laid low, when her people were bowed down in the ashes of despair, the generous world came to her assistance; and lightning words told her to be of good cheer, because bread and money were coming to aid her. Chicago, remembering all this, knowing no jealousy, will feel that not three and one-third cents should have been voted by her Representatives, but will say, ay, the poorest man that carries a hod or wields a pick, will tap me on the shoulder and tell me I ought to have voted a dollar.

Sir, I hope this appropriation will pass, and I hope that my southern friends—and I will say to them that I was myself born on southern soil—will not allow this opportunity to pass without proving to the North that they have as much pride in the Fourth of July as any man in the North. It belongs to us all in common. I know they are strict constructionists. I hope they will be able to see, as I do, a right under the Constitution to vote for this measure. And then on the 4th of July next at Philadelphia the people, gathering from every part of the Union, will feel that the glory of the pageant is theirs.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman mean to imply that members who are opposed to this bill are disloyal to the Government?

Mr. HARRISON. By no means.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope not. No such test as that should be made.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to my friend from Tennessee that, although I did not fight myself, I have read that brave men are always the first to strike hands across the bloody chasm; that true soldiers bear no ill-will after the smoke of battle is over.

Mr. ATKINS. I am ready to strike hands across the bloody chasm, but I am not going to vote for this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. That, Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman's own right, and I do not question his motives, however he may vote.

Mr. Chairman, I hope and trust that this appropriation will pass by as large a vote as possible; and if it could be a unanimous vote I feel that it would be for the good of our whole country.

Mr. COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, ss I intend to cast my vote against the bill now under consideration, I feel that in justice to myself I should briefly state my views and the conclusions at which I have arrived. I do not, sir, fail to appreciate the delicacy of the position which I occupy. Representing, as I do, a Pennsylvania district, it may be thought singular that I should oppose the passage of a bill which proposes to grant an appropriation to an object in which the people of my State are very warmly interested. It is in order that my motives may not be misunderstood or misinterpreted that I suffer my voice to be heard at this time. I have listened, sir, with a great deal of pleasure and with profound interest to the earnest and patriotic utterances of the gentlemen who have preceded me. I heartily concur with them in the opinion not only that we should hold a national celebration, but that that celebration should be made an entire success by the people of this country. No member of this House would feel more keenly the humiliation incident to a failure of that celebration than I would; no one would rejoice more heartily in its entire success. Surely, sir, we should celebrate our centennial, and surely no more appropriate place could be found for such celebration than Philadelphia, the birth-place of American Independence.

That great, good results would flow from such a celebration I have little doubt. I have no doubt but that it would tend to give a fresh impetus to the business of this State and perhaps indirectly affect the business of other portions of the country; that it would tend to elevate and refine the tastes of the people, and afford us a grand opportunity to show the wondrous strides which we have made as a nation in arts, sciences, trades, and manufactures. And I would fain hope, sir, that it would accomplish much more than this. That it would serve to kindle anew in the American heart the fire of patriotism, to obliterate all distinctions between the people of the North and South, the East and the West, and place all in the grand category of American citizens. Shiloh, Antietam, and Gettysburgh would be forgotten in the remembrance of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill; and then we could march forward into the second century of our Republic a free, united people, with one ambition, one interest, one flag, and one country.

But, Mr. Chairman, although I entertain these views, I am opposed to the passage of the centennial bill. I am opposed to it, because I do not believe that Congress has any constitutional power to make such an appropriation. I deeply regret that in this House those who have conscientious scruples against passing such a bill should be subjected to the sneers of so-called patriots. A singular sort of patriotism is that which has its birth in a violation of the provisions of that Constitution which we have all sworn to support and defend.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that my very capable friend and colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS,] the chairman of the Select Committee on the Centennial, would have in the presentation of this bill submitted to this House something like a constitutional argument. I listened with pleasure to his patriotic utterances. His speech was one very eloquent in its character; but, sir, I was surprised, I was astounded, when he reached the question which lies at the very threshold of our consideration of this bill, the constitutional power of Congress. He resorted rather to the weapons of a woman than of a statesman, and answered the question by asking another.

"Mr. Chairman," said the gentleman, "the question has been asked where did we derive power to make this appropriation. I answer by asking." He then goes on and asks a series of questions, but he does not undertake to hint at the views which he entertained in reference to the constitutional power. He uses this language:

> But, Mr. Chairman, I do not admit there is the slightest doubt about the constitutional power to make this appropriation. I do not propose to go into any extended argument on that point, but I hold in my hand a volume containing the messages of the early Presidents of this country, the fathers and founders of the Republic, the men whose great brains conceived and whose hands drafted this Constitution and transmitted it to us as the most priceless legacy they could leave to posterity. These men were familiar with the powers delegated to Congress and the extent and scope of those powers, and yet we find that Washington, who presided over the constitutional convention, Madison, who of all others was most conspicuous in drafting it, and Jefferson, who understood it quite as well as either, all concurred in asking and recommending to Congress appropriations analogous to this.

He brings Mr. Madison here as an authority for the constitutionality of this act. Before I conclude I propose to show by the words of Mr. Madison that he never conceived any such idea, but that he entertained a directly opposite one. I will notice some other points as I go along, but I will not now break the thread of my argument to do so. I have said that I do not believe that Congress has any power to grant an appropriation of this kind. The only clause under which it is pretended that any such power exists is the first clause of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution, which reads as follows: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." I do not intend at this time to enter into any formal argument as to the meaning of this clause of the Constitution. It is one over which there probably has been more discussion than over any other clause in the Constitution. Some of the greatest men our country has produced have differed as to its meaning. Of this, however, I am satisfied, that if Congress has the power to grant an appropriation for this centennial celebration it has the power to grant an appropriation for almost any other purpose. And if this be true, then our Government is one of unenumerated and general powers, and not one possessing only powers special and enumerated.

It may be said that the power of appropriation is not a general one, but is qualified by the words "general welfare," that no appropriation can be made unless it is designed to effect or provide for the general welfare. But what does this qualification amount to? Who is to determine what is or is not for the general welfare? Congress. If, then, Congress has the power to make an appropriation for the general welfare, and also to determine at its discretion what is or is not for the general welfare, the power is unlimited, and money may be appropriated for any purpose.

My friend [Mr. HOPKINS] has cited Mr. Madison as indorsing the view that Congress has the power to grant such an appropriation as this. I beg leave to read a very brief paragraph on page 326 of the Federalist, which contains Mr. Madison's views on the subject. It reads as follows:

> Some who have not denied the necessity of the power of taxation have grounded a very fierce attack against the Constitution on the language in which it is defined. It has been urged and echoed that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," amounts to an unlimited commission to exercise every power which may be alleged to be necessary for the common defense or general welfare. No stronger proof could be given of the distress under which these writers labor for objections than their stooping to such a misconstruction.

Mr. Madison, therefore, whom the gentleman has seen fit to quote, and who he says would justify the power which is now sought to be exercised by Congress, entertained just the opposite views from those attributed to him by the honorable gentleman.

But this is no new question that I am discussing, nor are the thoughts that I am expressing original with myself. They are not novel. Any one who has read the debates knows very well the questions involved in this discussion. But I beg leave in this same connection, and as singularly applicable to the subject now under consideration, to call the attention of this House to the views of one of America's brightest and most patriotic statesmen—a man who is a credit to the country in which he lives. I refer to the honorable Senator from Ohio, Mr. THURMAN. In 1874 there was pending in the Senate of the United States a proposition to grant an appropriation to this Centennial Commission. It was proposed to refer the matter to the Committee on Appropriations, with the understanding that the committee should determine what amount should be appropriated. At that time Mr. THURMAN used the following language:

> Now, in the first place, with respect to the constitutional power, what Senator on this floor has pointed to one line or one letter of the Constitution that authorizes any such appropriation? My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania who sits nearest to me, [Mr. SCOTT,] than whom there is no man in the Senate better qualified to answer such a proposition, if it could be successfully answered, when appealed to to point to that provision in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to give money for any such purpose, was compelled to answer simply by saying the thing had been done before, or things equally without warrant. No man has ventured to point to any such provision, and I imagine that the only provision that can be pointed to is the very well-known clause in regard to the power of Congress to levy taxes.

No gentleman who has preceded me in this debate has attempted to point to a line in the Constitution which justifies this appropriation. But to return to the remarks of Senator THURMAN. That honorable gentleman proceeds as follows:

> The first clause of section 8 of the first article of the Constitution reads:
>
> "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."
>
> I need not say to every lawyer in the Senate that these words, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," are not construed now by any lawyer anywhere to be a distinct and substantive grant of power. It is very true that the Senator from Texas [Mr. FLANAGAN] the other day treated it as a substantive and independent grant of power, and thought that the Constitution gives us power to provide for the general welfare of the United States, just precisely as we may see fit to provide for it.
> I need not say to those who are somewhat more familiar with this subject that that interpretation of the Constitution would wipe out all the rest of it and every limitation of power whatsoever that is contained in it, and that it would be useless to talk of a strict construction or a latitudinarian construction, if there were in the Constitution a distinct, substantive, independent grant of power to the Congress of the United States to do whatever in its discretion would promote the general welfare of the United States. No, sir; the history of that clause and its meaning is well understood—not that it is not capable of different interpretations. The interpretation that has obtained more generally than any other is that suggested first, I believe, by Mr. Madison, and adopted by Judge Story in his Commentaries, to insert after the word "excises" the words "in order;" so that the clause should be read as if it were thus: "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." That is the interpretation which perhaps has the greatest weight of opinion in its support.
>
> An interpretation, I know, has been contended for that is almost as bad as that other interpretation contended for by the Senator from Texas the other day, which makes the clause "to provide for the general welfare" a distinct, substantive, and independent grant of power, for it is said that you may levy "taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare of the United States;" that is, that your power to raise taxes is only limited by the general welfare and that for any purpose that Congress in its discretion deems to be promotive of the general welfare Congress may levy taxes; and if it may levy taxes for such purposes, of course it can expend them for such purposes. That is the argument. Therefore no matter what it is, if Congress shall suppose that it is "for the general welfare of the United States" to set up a particular government in the Sandwich Islands, or to establish schools in China or Japan to educate those people because they have intercourse with us, if Congress should deem that that would be for "the general welfare of the United States," it could levy taxes for that object, and having levied them it could expend them for that purpose. That is the argument upon which many an appropriation that, in my judgment, is entirely violative of the spirit, if not the very text, of the Constitution has been supported, and upon which alone, so far as I can see, must this appropriation be supported if it can be supported at all.
> But, sir, is it true that Congress has a right to levy taxes for any purpose whatsoever that in its discretion it may consider may be promotive of the public welfare? I deny the proposition. Congress has a right to promote the general welfare, as it has a right to provide for the common defense; but here is the rule, a rule that ought to be as inflexible as the laws of the Medes and Persians, that you can only provide for the general welfare by exercising the powers that are delegated to you in the Constitution. That is the mode in which you are to provide for the general welfare; not by going outside of the express delegations of power and roaming through all the universe of things to find something that in your judgment would be promotive of the general welfare.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I need say anything more in support of the views which I entertain upon this constitutional question.

But, sir, we are told that the national honor is involved in the making of this appropriation. Who is it that has raised this cry of "national honor?" Our people at home? No; but the friends and advocates of the centennial exposition; and I say in this presence to-day that those gentlemen are in no position to preach about national honor; that they have thrice pledged their honor to this House that they will not ask for a dollar of appropriation from public moneys.

Turn to the first act on this subject which was passed by Congress in 1871, and you will find the provision there that "no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act, from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exposition or by reason of the same."

Now my colleague and friend [Mr. HOPKINS] the worthy chairman of the Centennial Committee sees fit to designate this section as an "amazing inconsistency." The section which protected the public Treasury is an "amazing inconsistency!" Well, perhaps it may have been an "amazing inconsistency" in one respect: that generally the Congresses that have had the majority here for fifteen years have not been in the habit of thus guarding the public money. It certainly was a little inconsistent for them to act as they did in this case; but it was an inconsistency for which we ought to give them credit.

Now, it will be marked that these gentlemen stated, when they first proposed to carry on this exposition in Philadelphia, that it was a work which would emanate from the people, and that not a dollar of public money should be demanded from Congress. There were gentlemen both in the House and in the Senate who were opposed to the passage of this measure, who would have worked and spoken against it had it not been for the pledge that was then made that no appropriation should be sought for. Why, during the discussion of this bill in the Senate, the question was asked by Mr. THURMAN of Mr. CAMERON, the Senator from Pennsylvania, who had the bill in charge, "What do you want Congress to recognize this exposition for?" What was the answer? "Simply to give the thing character." They were after "character" for their enterprise; and upon that plea, and under the assurance that no public money would be demanded, this first bill of 1871 was passed.

What is the next step in the programme? In 1872, a year after the passage of the act to which I have just referred, it was considered by some of these gentlemen possible that this might be a good speculation, and consequently we find them coming to the Senate and House and asking that they may be granted a charter making this thing a corporation; as much of a corporation as any corporation which exists in the United States to-day. What does that charter grant? It gives the power to elect officers; it gives the power to have a common seal, to sue and be sued; and it further provides that when the Centennial shall have been ended the money realized therefrom, after the payment of debts and liabilities, shall be divided pro rata among the stockholders. If that is not a corporation, then I do not know what a corporation is. Strip it of the tinsel which these gentlemen have placed about it, rob it of the false patriotism in which these gentlemen would clothe it, and you have nothing more nor less in this House to-day than an application by a corporation for a subsidy. [Applause.]

When this charter was granted, again the question was raised whether there should be any Government appropriation asked for, and what was the reply? "O, no, not a dollar; we do not want a dollar of Government money." In order to make assurance doubly sure, a republican Congress included in this act also a section that the Government should not be responsible for a dollar of the indebtedness.

Now I want to call the attention of the House just here to a provision contained in the act of 1871. Not only did this Congress provide that the Government should not be responsible for any indebtedness but they went on in section 8 to provide as follows:

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose—

Mark you—

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose and for the exclusive control of the commission hereinafter provided for, then the President shall issue his proclamation.

Do you not see what a guard that was? They not only said the Government should not be responsible, but they put an additional safeguard. They required the governor of Pennsylvania to certify that provisions had been made for the erection of these buildings. When we turn over a little further, to the proclamation of the President of the United States, what is recited there? "Whereas his excellency the governor of said State of Pennsylvania did, on the 24th day of June, 1873, inform me that provision had been made for the erection of said buildings," &c. It was by virtue of the fact that it was certified by the governor of Pennsylvania that the provision was made for the erection of these buildings that the President issued his proclamation inviting foreign nations to come over to this exhibition with their goods, wares, and merchandise.

Yet these gentlemen come in here and talk about the national honor. Sir, national honor first requires the protection of the national treasury. The very proclamation that was made by the President of the United States contains the following language:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the President be first requested to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and to take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States in the year 1876: Provided, however, That the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any expense attending such exposition or by reason of the same.

In the very power which was given to the President we find this limitation. Mr. Chairman, there are certain gentlemen in this House who pay the most glowing tributes to the American eagle, who make that celebrated bird start at the Atlantic and not stop until he gets to the Pacific and dips his wings in the waters of that ocean, and who stand up in the face of the Constitution of the United States and virtually argue that patriotism consists in its violation. Well, if that is the stock of patriotism some gentlemen have I am totally devoid of it.

A MEMBER. Sentimental patriotism.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes, but I am in favor of practical common sense.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have really suffered myself to occupy the attention of this House longer than I had intended. I come from the western part of Pennsylvania, and I am proud of the State from which I come.

When I stood before my people I pledged my word to them as a man that I would vote against subsidies to corporations; and this is a subsidy to a corporation. They say that it is a loan. But if we have no power to give, we have no power to lend; and I do not think that my friend the chairman of the Centennial Committtee can cite any authority either from Washington, or Jefferson, or Madison that the Government of the United States can become a copartner in an enterprise like this or a stockholder in a corporation. I do not think he can. If he can, then I have failed to discover any such, and his research is greater than mine.

I say, sir, that I am proud of the patriotism of the people of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia has subscribed or made a gift to these gentlemen of a million and a half of money; the State has made a present of $1,000,000. That makes makes two and a half millions. They have received, if I am correctly informed, about $300,000 in addition, making $2,800,000 of a gift. In addition to that, under an act of Congress all goods that may come to this exposition are admitted free of duty. That is a gift by the Government. With all this money that has been given to them it strikes me they ought to be satisfied.

Before I conclude I beg to put, in a very plain and homely way perhaps, a suggestion which has struck me as very important. These gentlemen come to the members of this House. Who are we? We are simply agents of the people. It is not our money that is in the Treasury of the United States; it is the money of the people. Well, now they come to us, and what do they say? "We have gone to the people of the United States, and owing to the financial embarrassments under which they are laboring, owing to the depression of business, the people have told us that they were not able to advance any money to this exposition. Now we come to you, agents only of the people, and ask you to advance the money for our enterprise." The agent who would so act in an ordinary transaction in life would not only be dishonest but he would be held responsible for his act in a court of justice. Yet they ask us agents to do in our official capacity what our principals, the people, have said they are not able to do.

Sir, I am opposed to this whole principle of devoting public money to these purposes. They talk about precedents. O, we have had a great many precedents in this land of ours. We have had the sacred provisions of the Constitution of the United States trodden under foot by a radical administration. We have had those provisions distorted and extended beyond any reasonable limit. Hundreds of thousands of acres of the public lands have been frittered away. Millions of dollars of the public moneys have been squandered upon corporations that are bankrupt. Now they come to us, who are in these seats by reason of the pledge to our people that we will save the public money, they come to us and ask us to ratify all these unconstitutional acts which have been perpetrated heretofore, and to signalize our entrance into power as a party by the granting of this appropriation. Mr. Chairman, I will never assent to it. Never. I will put myself upon the record from the very beginning as opposed to a policy that has almost rendered bankrupt the people of this country; and although I would like on account of many considerations to vote for this bill, I shall vote against it; and when I go home to my people I will be able to look them in the eye and say, "I kept the pledge that I made you before you elected me." [Applause.]

Mr. FRYE. I now give five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the well-rounded periods of my youthful colleague, and remembered that he did not utter the sentiments of one-tenth of one per cent. of his constituents, I could not help thinking of the disagreeable habit imposed upon the Trappist monks of digging their own grave the day they enter the order and making it a part of their daily duty to see that it is in good condition. I do not know through what association of ideas it was, but that fact was present with me through the whole of his remarks, except for a moment or two when I thought of the venerable democracy of my friend from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] who is now fully a year, and probably eighteen months, old as a democrat, and who appealed yesterday to members to vote against this bill in order to maintain the Constitution and honor those party traditions he had opposed until less than eighteen months ago. It is never too late for a man to be converted, and new converts are said to be unusually zealous. If the democrats of the past had accepted the argument of either of them, there would be no Dome on this Capitol, for it was the strict-construction democracy that provided for the construction of the Dome. It was they who bought the pictures that embellish the Rotunda it crowns; yet my colleague and that venerable democrat from New York can find no warrant in the Constitution for purchasing a flag to float over the Dome, as it is not necessary for the national defense or the public welfare.

Mr. WILLIS. I would state to the gentleman that while a republican I was no less a democrat.

Mr. KELLEY. Ah! I have no doubt of that; only the gentleman did not vote with the party when it had not offices to give or did not have any possible prospect of having any under the State or National Government. [Laughter.] I have never heard in this Hall speeches marked more distinctly by personal or local prejudice; for I venture to say that there is as wild and universal an enthusiasm for the Centennial in Pittsburgh as there is in Philadelphia.

I am not going to make an argument on the subject. I have spoken more than once on the subject, and have now but five minutes. But I have been used to hearing for well-nigh half a century of constitutional scruples, and am going to promise these gentlemen, both of them, that upon the happening of a certain melancholy event I will give them the benefit of their constitutional scruples. In the olden time a certain member of Congress, a strict constructionist, who had been here during a long session in which constitutional questions had been much agitated, found as it drew to its close that he also drew to a close; he was very sick; he was fatally sick; the doctors had told him he could not recover, and that he had at best but a few days to live and it might be but a few hours. He sent for one of his colleagues, who came in melancholy mood to his bedside, expecting to receive perhaps messages for his family or a request to aid him to make his will. He was, however, mistaken; for, said the sick man, gasping for breath, "Jones, I am sick. I am very sick, Jones. I am going to die. I have a request to make of you. Jones, maintain my fidelity to the Constitution when I am gone. Do not, for God's sake, let them bury me in the Congressional burying-ground, for it would be unconstitutional." [Laughter.] I give my colleague and the portly and elegant gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] a positive assurance that if they die during this Congress I will see that the Constitution is not violated by their being buried in the Congressional Cemetery. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will accept the assurance that that matter has been provided for about half a century hence; and I would ask him if he is in strict accordance with the republican church himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I am not discussing political questions. I am speaking on a question that relates to the honor of every constituent of the gentleman. The United States have challenged the world to competition in all the arts of industry, and I am unwilling that they shall come here to put their goods in a mortgaged building or that our hospitality shall be shrunken and incomplete because the gentlemen profess to believe that their constituents are unwilling to pay three and one-half cents apiece, one-half of which will be returned to them within a year.

Mr. WILLIS. In such discussion the gentleman alluded to my personality and political standing. That was the reason why I inquired of him concerning his own.

Mr. KELLEY. I only wanted to show how very juvenile your democracy was.

Mr. WILLIS. More so than the gentleman's, for he has only been converted about three weeks. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention until yesterday to participate in any way in this debate. In what I shall have to say I do not propose to controvert the views presented by any member who has preceded me in this discussion. Nor do I propose to look at anything in the light of a partisan, but simply as a representative of a part of the American people. If in these remarks I touch incidentally on any question which might seem inappropriate to the occasion, before concluding the few observations which I have to make it will be seen that it was for no purpose of unkindness, but for the purpose of illustrating the views I present and the position in which I find myself in this connection.

In determining to vote for the centennial bill, I am confronted by considerations well calculated to produce embarrassment, and which may not be realized by gentlemen differently situated. Those may well rejoice who are free, and prosperous, and happy; those who are weighed down with poverty, suffering from proscription, and remaining under the displeasure of the Government can but mourn over their condition and hope for a better future.

We have among us soldiers of the war of 1812, heroes of our second war for independence, who fought the battles of our country before many of us were born, and who are now tottering into the grave, who are not permitted to draw their pensions because they may have sympathized with the South in the recent civil war, though then too old to participate in it. We have public contractors who carried the mails and did other service for the Government before the war, who, for the same reason, are refused compensation. And we still have a few hundred men, and these for the most part the best, the wisest, and most conservative among us, who are denied some of the rights of American citizenship.

These classes, while they may rejoice at every step toward peace and reconciliation, must still feel that they are precluded from participating in the feelings of universal joy which should characterize the year and the occasion; that there is no year of peace and jubilee with them. I do not say these things in a querulous spirit, but rather with a painful sense that duty requires that they should be said.

But looking to other and broader considerations, and desiring to reflect the wishes of the great body of the people I represent, in favor of charity and good-will between the people of all parts of the county, and in the hope that fuller justice will be done the classes I have referred to in the future, and to avoid the suspicion that the people I represent are still hostile to the Government, and especially because I believe the year and the occasion can be made to subserve the noble purpose of re-establishing fraternal good feelings throughout the country, of re-unifying the American people, of creating anew the feelings of patriotism common to the whole country, so that the whole people can participate in the blessings of liberty, in the expense of preserving it, in the perils, if need be, of defending it, as one common brotherhood, as our people were in former years.

The southern people are peculiarly interested in the events of this year. A great and protracted civil war, with the long controversy which led to it, and a system of what was called reconstruction measures, as disastrous to them as the war itself, have so wrenched and distorted the Constitution, and obscured and perverted the principles of civil liberty and just government, as to make a serious and earnest recurrence to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, of the Constitution of the United States, and of the spirit and genius of our Government and institutions a paramount necessity. This, it seems to me, is the most vital thought connected with the centennial celebration to every part of the country and to all the people.

I feel that I represent truly the wishes and the interests of those who sent me here by showing by this vote that we at least can forgive in our sufferings and sorrows, if others cannot in their triumphs and prosperity. And in this vote I give one of the best pledges I can of the desire of our people to be restored to their proper place in the Union, to participate in its prosperity, to enjoy the blessings common to all others in it, and share in its glories.

It is wonderful to contemplate the progress of our own country and the world during the past century. The invention and successful use of the various labor-saving machines, the application of steam and electricity to the practical uses of life, the improvements in chemistry and in the mechanic arts, the discovery and application of new principles in philosophy and science, have gone beyond what could have been dreamed of by our revolutionary sires. The diffusion of knowledge which has been brought about by the high perfection of the art of printing and by the improved facilities for printing books and newspapers, the rapid transmission of intelligence by the mails and telegraph, and the facilities for rapid intercommunication by steam vessels and railroads have created a new world, and done much toward making all useful knowledge common to the human family, while our own progress in agriculture, in manufacturing, and in commerce is the wonder of mankind.

A hundred years ago we had but a little over three millions of population. Now we have forty millions. Then our settlements were limited to the country east of the Alleghany Mountains and to a few settlers in the Ohio Valley. Now they extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean and from the Great Lakes to the Rio Grande. Then that vast region of country west of the Alleghany Mountains, and especially west of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, was almost an unknown wilderness to our ancestors, the hunting-grounds of the savage Indian tribes. Now our settlements dot it all over, our armies patrol the whole of our frontier regions, mails carry the news, social and business intelligence to every part of the country, and our seventy-two thousand miles of railroad span the continent and furnish the means of the most rapid travel and transportation to nearly all parts of the Republic. These things, this wonderful advancement in material progress and development, are certainly worthy of commemoration at the end of the first hundred years of our political existence as a people. But I do not mention them so much for that purpose as to state by contrast that we have something still more worthy of commemoration.

A hundred years ago the received political theory of the great powers of the earth was that kings and emperors ruled the people by some sort of right superior to any which could spring from themselves, sometimes called divine right; that the body of the people were incapable of self-government, of preserving political authority and public order and the rights of person and of property if left to themselves; that they must be governed by a higher authority than they possessed; that they were subjects as contradistinguished from citizens; that they must be ruled by power, force, repression, instead of by their voluntary consent.

Privileged orders in society, embracing king and nobles, were necessary to support this theory. The splended, titled, gilded few, the oppressed and toiling many, with despotism, oppression, and wrongs in all their forms, were its necessary fruits.

The Declaration of Independence of the 4th of July, 1776, was the brave, bold, clear, ringing announcement, by earnest, thoughtful, wise men, of a political theory, which, if not new to the world, was new in its practical application, as furnishing the political rules for the preservation of the rights and liberties of a whole people.

In that, man's capacity for self-government was announced as a political axiom. All titles of nobility and exclusive privileges were declared at an end. A government resting on the free, voluntary consent of the people was proclaimed. Political sovereignty was declared to reside in the people. Following these declarations, a system of government, State and Federal, was adopted which secured to our people all the bulwarks of civil liberty reserved out of the powers of the governments which they formed for themselves.

No Congress or Legislature, no President or governor, no judge of a Federal or State court, no officer of the Army or Navy, was allowed to invade or disregard the rights of the humblest citizen. No citizen could be arrested by arbitrary power, but only on an affidavit charging an offense against the law, and upon a lawful warrant, and by a person authorized by law to execute it. And any citizen so arrested was entitled to a speedy public trial; to be heard by himself or his counsel in his defense; to be confronted by the witnesses against him, and to have compulsory process to obtain witnesses in his favor; to a fair trial by a jury of his peers; with the military declared subordinate to the civil authority, and the inestimable right of the writ of habeas corpus declared inviolate; the duties of all public officers defined by the Constitution and laws, and they held amenable for any infraction of the laws as strictly as the most humble citizen in the walks of private life; no man, in whatever position, above the law, and all under the ægis of its protection. These were among its beneficent, its heaven-born provisions. It was, in brief, the establishment of a government founded on the authority of the people, and and made by them for their own benefit. It was a grand political experiment, scoffed at and derided by the friends of royalty and aristocracy as the inauguration of organized anarchy, but now vindicated by a hundred years of experience in peace and war, and under all the vicissitudes to which governments are exposed, as the best system of government ever designed by the wisdom of man, illustrated by the most wonderful growth and development of any known to the history of the world.

It is to these immortal, undying principles, to this peculiarly American federal system of government, uniting many States in one, and so dividing their powers as to leave national and international matters to the Federal Government and local matters to the several States, that we are indebted for all we are as a people; for all our great growth in population, in wealth, in power, in material development, in liberty, and in the happiness of our people.

The preservation of these principles and this system is, in my judgment, the sole condition on which the Republic can be made to survive to another and other centennial years. God grant they may be preserved to bless a thousand other generations.

If these propositions are true, (and who is there that will question their truth?) then the chief merit of the centennial celebration should be made to consist in asserting anew these great principles and this system, and in contributing our part to transmit them to our posterity as we received them from our revolutionary fathers.

Let us in this centennial year honor these as the cause of our growth, prosperity, power, and greatness in a higher degree than we may our material development, which is but the fruit which they have borne. And let us re-embalm the memories of the great and good men who gave this political system to us and to the world.

I would in conclusion add the expression of one hope, of one prayer, humbly and earnestly, and that is that some good spirit may so direct the action of this Congress that on the 4th day of next July every citizen in this Republic may be as free as American citizens were intended to be made by the Declaration of Independence, and possessed of all the rights which the Constitution and laws secure to any.

I beg to call the attention of the committee to the fact that Great Britain, against whom our fathers rebelled, forgetting what she lost in the war of the Revolution and by our success, and guided alike by wise statesmanship and Christian charity, will be here to do honor to this great occasion. Shall it be our own people alone, on this great festival of freedom, to whom the assembled representatives of all nations shall on that day point as being so lacking in charity and wisdom as to make a few hundred out of so many millions feel the bitter anguish which must follow a denial to them of the rights of citizenship? Let us make the year a centennial and a jubilee together.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take any part whatever in the discussion of the question now before the committee. It seems always to me an assumption if I ask gentlemen having the floor for time to speak, or if I ask that my name be put upon the list of the Speaker; an assumption that I have something to say which it is absolutely necessary should be said to give an intelligent idea of the question before the House, and I dislike exceedingly to do it; and if I had not found my name placed without my knowledge on the list I should not have asked an opportunity.

Sir, it does not seem to me now that there is any existing necessity whatsoever for any more discussion or talk on this centennial appropriation. I was here when it was under discussion in a former Congress, and I took part in it. Alone of the delegates from my State I favored with all the influence I had and with all the power I possessed—which was weakness, I admit—an appropriation for the Centennial of my country. To-day I am more in favor of it than I was even then. During that discussion certain objections were made which had strength; undoubtedly they were enforced, too, by the gentleman who made them with ability and power. Now, sir, do those objections lie to-day? What were they? The first which was raised at that time, and seriously urged upon the attention of the House, was that this was a proposition to take the money of the country and put it into the hands of a ring, of whose members you knew comparatively nothing, and that it would perhaps be squandered, wasted, thrown away, or stolen. Well, sir, there was force in that. It is unfortunately true that men to-day are mere men. They are human, and when you put immense sums of money into their hands to be expended they are subject to all the temptations of humanity. But that objection does not lie now. They did not get their appropriation then. They went forward with the work, raised money from the people, largely from Pennsylvania and Philadelphia, and now they point this House to what they have done and the contracts they have made. They have secured the money, they have paid it out, and they boldly defy any man to name any waste, or any extravagance, or any stealing of the funds committed to their care. Sir, most of the gentlemen of this committee have visited Philadelphia; they have examined the contracts which were made, and they will sustain me in saying that no contracts were ever more carefully entered into; that no margin was ever so small for profits to the contractor; that the contractors would have lost in carrying out their work but for the reason that iron, nails, and lumber have fallen since their contracts were made 20 per cent. in cost, thus giving them a fair margin for profits. But there is no waste or extravagance to be seen anywhere in the expending of the money. I submit, then, to this committee that that objection does not lie to-day.

Sir, what was the next objection, more potent than the one to which I have just referred? It was that the appropriation of $3,000,000 was but the entering wedge to another of ten millions or more, that Congress might be compelled to assume the whole cost of the exposition

I remember that my colleague from Maine [Mr. HALE] with great power and with telling effect for a half an hour urged that objection upon this House. I know that he drove it home to the hearts and the intellects of men on this floor so forcibly that several real friends of the measure were induced to vote against the bill. There was force in that objection. I freely admit that it might have been opening a door, and there was no certainty when that door would be closed. But I had more faith in man.

But that objection lies not to-day. These gentlemen have made their exhibit of the work they have accomplished. They have given you an account, dollar for dollar, of what has been expended. They have told you what will be required now to be expended to finish and complete in every part and particular these immense buildings and prepare them for the exhibition. They say to you it shall not cost over $1,500,000. They have been proved in the past; they have been found honest in what they have done. We know that the president of that commission is as honest a man as can be found in the country. And he says, and his colleagues in office too say, that this sum of money which is asked for to-day shall be every dollar that will be required to complete this work; and gentlemen on this floor believe that statement when it is made, so that that objection does not lie to-day.

And all the objections urged upon the floor of this House in the last Congress fall as against the appropriation now before this committee. What objections take their places? Gentlemen opposed to a measure always find some plausible objection, some cover under which to flee. And what is the first? O, it is the same old cover, the Constitution of the United States.

Now, I do not propose to discuss the constitutional powers of Congress; the subject is altogether too mighty for me—too broad, too serious. When I remember that Daniel Webster and John C. Calhoun and Thomas H. Benton sat in that Senate Chamber and voted money again and again under precisely the same rules that we to-day ask this appropriation, and kept their silence while giving their votes, raised no cry of violated Constitution, I surely dare not argue that this proposition to-day is unconstitutional. When they voted money to pay for the passage from Europe to this country of that man and patriot, [pointing to the portrait of Lafayette,] when the great men of the land, living, as you gentlemen on that side aver, nearer to the Constitution—more closely to it than we have during the last fifteen years—voted for appropriations precisely like this, I say it is not for my voice to pronounce it unconstitutional. When Kossuth visited this country and appropriations were made to pay the expenses of that visit and of his entertainment, and the great men of the past voted for it, my voice surely shall not charge them with deliberately doing an unconstitutional act. There is a long, uninterrupted line of precedents from the earliest history of Congress to now.

Mr. KELLEY. Food for Ireland.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, food for Ireland. Ay, and within the last three years furnishing food to the famishing, down on the rivers of the South, by a vote of the Congress of the United States. Building domes, buying pictures, ornamenting stairways, and beautifying halls.

This Constitution has been from my earliest boyhood, at least since I could tell what the meaning of the word "constitution" was, a most wonderful enigma to me. Under it almost anything has been done that men desire to do, and their course has been defended. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] could wrong the Union and go out of it, and at the same time hug that Constitution to his breast. And, sir, under it old Faneuil Hall, in the city of Boston, was compelled to see two thousand of her brave soldiers march through her streets to the sound of the drum, and with burnished musket at the shoulder, fighting down one poor slave, while under it the Chief Executive of this country could find no power whatsoever by which the Republic could be saved, no power by which a State seceding could be coerced.

On the contrary, we of the republican party saw in the same Constitution power to do almost anything without limit. We could issue greenbacks, call them money, and make them legal-tender. Ay, we could do anything under the same Constitution to compel the gentleman to come back into the Union. We honestly justified ourselves under the Constitution; they as honestly took the same Constitution with them when they attempted to leave. Now, I say it is an enigma to me. Men make it a cover under which almost anything can be hidden; an excuse for almost any act which the majority in the Congress of the United States may desire to pass, or an obstruction to any legislation, however necessary. I am not charging wrong upon one man or claiming right for another. I bring no politics into the question now under discussion. I bring no feeling whatsoever except an honest feeling for the honor of the Republic. I desire above all things else at Philadelphia in 1876 to beat the nations of the world, and to let our people and other people know that we do beat them. That is my only desire and only wish, and it appeals to me strongly.

Now, in addition to the constitutional objection, what is there? It came from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] who said: "Do gentlemen forget the millions of toilers in this country of ours who can never behold the magnificent scene at Philadelphia, and will they put this burden upon their broad shoulders, now burdened to the very earth?" I ask the gentleman from New York, does he forget who are the toilers of the Republic? Does he forget that by the hundred thousand, when the tocsin of war sounded, they left home and workshops and comforts, and went forth willing to do battle for the honor and integrity of their country? The toilers of this Republic! The toilers of the land! Does the gentleman forget that the foundation-stone of this Republic is the "toiler?" That in the hour of dire necessity we make our appeal to him, and that he never fails us.

I would go to the toilers in the gentleman's own district to-day for the honor of the country, for its glory, for its integrity, for the old flag, a thousand times sooner than to the princes of his Wall street. The toilers love the Republic; they know what it cost; they sympathize with it in its glory; they would feel bitterly its shame.

And when he says they will never see the magnificent spectacle, and therefore it will be a burden to them, he puts a selfish charge upon them that because they see not they care not. Why, sir, there will not be a textile fabric there of silk, of cotton, of woolen, of linen, which these toilers of the country have not had a hand in the fashioning and making. There will not be at Philadelphia a piece of machinery, from the locomotive down to the simplest machine the hands of man can fashion, which the "toilers of the land" will not have worked upon, will not have burnished and beautified for exhibition and competition with the world. Sir, there will not be there an agricultural implement, from a plow or a harrow up to the most expensive and costly mowing-machine, which they will not fashion and perfect. There will be scarcely anything there which will not bear their impress, which will not be the child of their hand and their brain, and to which they have not said a God-speed.

The "toilers of the land," I say to the gentleman, are the men of all other men in this country who have the deepest, the most abiding interest in making this centennial of ours a mighty success, because the success of our country in that centennial exposition is the success of her mechanics and her artisans. Ah, sir, if the gentlemen have no more valid objections than those, I trust they will not bear a feather's weight with the committee in determining this subject.

There are some gentlemen who, personally favoring this bill, desire to respect and obey the wishes of their constituents, (and that is proper;) think that they are not sufficiently alive to the subject; and would not justify a vote in favor of it. I simply wish to remind those gentlemen that in May this exposition opens, and that for the succeeding six months every paper in this broad country of ours will be full—morning, noon, and night—of the exposition then going on in Philadelphia; every heart will begin to feel itself lifted up with exultation as our people pour their treasures of art and manufactures, agriculture and mines, into these buildings; and before three months will have passed they will become a thoroughly united people, enthusiastically in favor of their country against the world. Ah, sir, any gentleman who votes against this measure will have a hundred times more difficulty in defending that vote next fall when he comes up for nomination or election before the people than he will have in justifying his vote for it.

Sir, in my own State, when I spoke before in favor of giving this exhibition national recognition and support, every newspaper in my district was opposed to it, and so were most of the people, I take it. To-day I believe the reverse to be true. I live in a city of only twenty thousand inhabitants, and there are from there already fourteen exhibitors, and the people are already chartering steamers to carry them from the city of Portland to Philadelphia. They are waking up, men and women, and to-day the united voice of my city is in favor of any thing that is absolutely necessary to make this Centennial a success. There has been assigned to Maine twelve hundred square feet of space for the exhibition of textile fabrics, and I am proud to say that Lewiston requires three-fourths of that. I cite this only as an illustration of the interest which is being awakened.

Sir, the people of Maine, the "toilers," will pour into Philadelphia in a mighty stream; Texas, California, and Oregon, too. In a word, our country will center there, and if the purposes of the commission can be carried out, will see its jubilee.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I am entirely conscious that in opposing this bill I shall meet cavils from gentlemen all around me and on the other side of this Hall at my wisdom, liberality, and patriotism. But however much I might be depressed by this view, I am cheered by the reflection that the path of duty lying before me in respect to this centennial bill is as clear as it ever was in regard to any question brought to my consideration.

Mr. Chairman, what do you propose to celebrate in this centennial year? Do you propose to have a material exhibition only, or an exhibition worthy of the great moral principles which are illustrated by the anniversary of our independence?

If I mistake not, three great principles underlie or are involved in the Declaration of Independence: the principle of individual liberty, the principle of local government in its struggle against centralized power, and the exemption of the American destiny from the controlling influence of European polity. I will cordially unite with gentlemen anywhere, North or South, East or West, in celebrating the centennial anniversary in the maintenance and illustration of these three principles, so vital and essential to the full success of our republican institutions.

Let me feel that the liberty of the citizen is secured against despotic power; let me be assured that the freedom and independent action, the autonomy of the States, as Chief Justice Chase has expressed it, is well guarded against the arbitrary and usurping exercise of Federal authority; let me see that American destiny is guided alone by its own polity and free from the interference and intrusion of European counsels; and then indeed, sir, we may have a real centennial anniversary!

The gentleman who preceded me [Mr. FRYE] has said that the Constitution and constitutional questions are an enigma to him. I am not surprised at it, looking at his mode of interpreting it. Any gentleman who will ever raise a constitutional question after this bill shall have passed upon the interpretation adopted to sustain its constitutionality, will really be worthy of commiseration.

I say, sir, that the spirit of the centennial is obedience to the Constitution. And when gentlemen tell me that the centennial exhibition is to be a manifestation of the inventive power of the American mind, I answer that the greatest invention of American genius has been left out of view entirely. And what is that? The greatest invention of American genius is this: the absolute subordination of governmental power to the rigid, inflexible, and unbending rule of the Constitution. In no other country on the earth has this principle of one inflexible law, supreme over all ordinary acts of legislation, ever been inaugurated among men. And I say that the gentlemen around me will better keep the centennial anniversary by a strict and honest adherence to the Constitution of the country than by all the material exhibition that can be aggregated in Philadelphia.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that one of the great principles which is illustrated in this centennial year is jealousy of the centralization of power. In the great preamble and resolutions of 1774, which were adopted by the Continental Congress assembled in Philadelphia, the language used has the true old English ring in its bold assertion of right against power: The deputies of the colonies do, "As Englishmen, their ancestors, in like cases have usually done, for asserting and vindicating their rights and liberties, declare that the inhabitants of the English colonies in North America, by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and the several charters and compacts, have the following rights," &c.

Then follow the cardinal rights of life, liberty, and property; the trial by jury; exemption from standing armies; and they place preeminently among these cardinal rights the right of the people of each colony to determine its own internal policy by its own provincial Legislature, without interference on the part of the imperial government of Great Britain.

These were the institutional rights and liberties which they claimed, demanded, and insisted on, as indubitable, and "which could not be legally taken from them, altered, or abridged by any power whatever, without their own consent by their representatives in their several provincial Legislatures."

It is thus clear that jealousy of centralizing power was the keynote of our Revolution. It was embodied in the Articles of Confederation. It was not lost sight of in the Constitution of the United States. And gentlemen will find, although they seem to think that a constitutional question is unworthy of deliberation on this floor, that the great distinction between delegated and reserved powers is contained in that tenth amendment: "All powers not delegated to the United States by this Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." This is, therefore, a Government of granted and enumerated, not of original and unlimited, powers. It is not like the governments of the countries to which gentlemen refer for precedents. It is not like the government of Great Britain, whose Parliament is omnipotent. It is a Government of granted and enumerated powers. And I claim this, not upon reference to any of the doctrines of 1798 and 1799, which I suppose are not in very good odor in some portions of this Hall, but I do it upon grounds stated by the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Martin vs. Hunter, (1 Wheat., 304,) uses this language:

> The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication.

And again, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheat., 1,) Chief Justice Marshall says:

> This instrument contains an enumeration of the powers expressly granted by the people to their Government.

And Mr. Justice Story, who certainly is not authority for any State-right view of the Constitution, uses this language in his Commentaries on the Constitution:

> That powers to be implied must be bona fide, appropriate to the end in view.

The same doctrine is stated by Chief Justice Chase in the great case of Hepburn and Griswold, known as the legal-tender case; and he sanctions the doctrine stated by the authorities already quoted.

If this be the mode of interpretation, and I think it must be the true canon of construction, then the question arises, where is the express grant of power to appropriate for this Centennial? Gentlemen admit there is no express grant of power; then where in this appropriation for the Centennial is there to be found the essential element of its being a necessary incident to any express grant of power? What granted power needs to be carried out by the passage of this bill?

There is no need for it in order to carry out any granted power, and none has been or can be shown. Then the bill must be rejected or the oath we have taken violated. I ask gentlemen to observe that oath. I took it in good faith, and I hope all gentlemen did:

I swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and that I take this oath without any mental reservation—

That is, I suppose, a mental reservation to break it—or evasion.

That is, without any intention to evade it. I meant what I said; and if this House meant what it said, as I have no doubt it did, how can its members vote for the passage of a bill for which there is no express grant of power and when the bill is not an essential incident to the carrying into execution of any express grant of power?

When Mr. Clay, I think, was discussing the bank bill in 1811, he is reported to have said that, whenever any one was in want of some clause of the Constitution on which a doubtful bill might light and rest, he referred it to the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States. Now, nobody has claimed that this centennial bill regulates commerce with foreign nations or among the States, that I have heard. The truth is, I may say in passing, that of all the powers granted by the Constitution, that power alone was granted by the convention which adopted it nemene contradicente, so clear were the framers of the Constitution that that power, in the sense in which they granted it, did not involve any danger to the reserved powers of the States.

Mr. HOAR. Would it be disagreeable to the gentleman from Virginia if I were to ask him a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. HOAR. I have been very much interested in the very able and clear statement made by the gentleman, and I desire to call his attention to one point, with the view of receiving his answer to it, which I can state in a single sentence. When the Constitution of the United States delegated to Congress certain national powers, among them the taking of a national attitude toward foreign nations, did it not intend that such expenditures for national dignity as are usual to nations wielding those powers should be made by Congress? As, for instance, the ornamenting the national Capitol with a Dome costing $10,000,000; the building of a tomb for General Washington, which Congress undertook to do at one time; the receiving of Lafayette, the national benefactor, in a national ship and providing for the expense of inviting him and bringing him here. Are not those expenditures within reasonable and suitable limits contained in the grant of the national powers, to the exercise of which with suitable dignity those expenditures are necessary? And is not the celebration of the centennial once in a hundred years one of its properly attendant and implied expenditures?

Mr. TUCKER. I am very much pleased, sir, to respond, as I shall do before I am done fully, I think, to the elaborate question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I thank the gentleman for the courtesy with which he has allowed me to put the question.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman need not thank me. I will always extend the same courtesy to any gentleman in this Hall. Now, sir, there is one element which is wanting as a basis for the whole hypothesis of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I would say that it is a substantive element, except that it is an adjective; it is the word "national." I want the learned gentleman from Massachusetts to point out to me—and I will give him until night to do so—the word "national" in respect to power or in respect to anything else in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. The powers to levy war, to conclude peace, to establish commerce, imply a nation in every line where they are granted.

Mr. TUCKER. If that, Mr. Chairman, is what the gentleman calls national power, very well. I understand him now. The gentleman quotes the power to levy war. By the by, there is no such power. There is the power to "declare" war, (I desire to be a little accurate,) and the power "to raise and support armies."

Mr. HOAR. We can levy war after we declare it.

Mr. TUCKER. That word "levy," however, is not in the Constitution. The Constitution also gives the power to Congress—

To provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

That covers the whole of the question which gentlemen have sometimes asked me: "How can you fire a salute?" It can be done under the power of Congress—

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I find in the letter of George Washington——

Mr. TUCKER. I would willingly yield to the gentleman, but I hope it will not come out of my time, for I have a good distance to travel yet.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I merely desire to call his attention to the letter of George Washington transmitting the Constitution to Congress, in which the Congress is called a national government.

Mr. TUCKER. I know that. What I said was that the word is not in the Constitution. The gentleman has not found it there. He finds it outside of the Constitution.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In the letter of the man who made it.

Mr. TUCKER. That man did not make it. No man made it. And the Federal convention did not make it. If the gentleman wants to know who made it, I say the States made it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the Constitution declare—

We, the people of the United States?

Mr. TUCKER. I am not to be betrayed now into a discussion of that old question.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is an old question. no doubt, and a question that lies at the foundation of this nation. The language is:

We, the people of the United States, * * * do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, nothing in the world would gratify me more than to discuss this question if I had time. I feel that upon this question I would like to have inquiries made of me on all sides; for I really think, from the stand-point I occupy, I could answer them successfully; but my friend from Indiana will excuse me if I do not go into that question. But if at any future period he desires to discuss it, I will be ready for that discussion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not intend to interrupt the gentleman, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. TUCKER. Now, sir, in reference to the power to pass this bill there is one phrase which is greatly relied upon; and if I can show that it fails to give constitutionality to this bill, then I think I will have cleared up all difficulties. Gentlemen have said that there is power given to Congress "to provide for the common defense and general welfare." I deny it in toto. I say there is no grant of power to provide for the common defense and general welfare. The language of the Constitution in connection with that phrase, its origin and adoption into the Constitution, and the debates in the Federal convention show conclusively that they indicate the object of the previously delegated tax power, and are not in themselves a substantive grant of power. This has been shown by what was said by my able friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COCHRANE.] He showed that Judge Story had interpreted the clause as if the words "in order" were inserted before the words "to pay debts," &c.; so that the clause would read:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, [in order] to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare; * * * but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.—Constitution United States, article 1, § 8.

That this is the true interpretation will appear from the grammatical construction of the sentence. It consists of three branches: the first as to laying and collecting, the second as to paying debts and providing for common defense and general welfare, and the third a qualification on the power in the first branch of the sentence. To suppose the learned men of the convention would have interjected as a substantive power the words in the second branch of the sentence, and then in the third branch qualified the first branch, would be to attribute to them a lamentable lack of knowledge of the rules of grammar and of style.

Hence the usual and generally-conceded construction of the second clause has been that it is attached to the first clause as a definition of the objects of the tax power, limiting its use only to such objects, and that the second clause cannot be fairly held to contain a new and substantive grant of power.

Now, sir, it is a very curious fact (and I beg to call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts to it) that this clause, "to provide for the common defense and general welfare," finds its origin in a Constitution which confessedly gave so little power to Congress that Congress had to beg from the States additional grants of power in order to perpetuate its own frail and precarious existence.

You will find that in three clauses of the Articles of Confederation, not adopted finally until March, 1781, and which were in force thereafter until the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789, the words are to be found. Thus in the eighth article, the following words occur: "All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare * * * shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States," &c. The same phrase occurs in two other clauses of the same instrument.

Now, sir, if these words give the power which gentlemen claim they give under the present Constitution, how was there any lack of power in the old Congress of the Confederation? And yet its lack of power was so notorious, so inconvenient, and so alarming that Congress came again and again to the very footstool of the States and begged for additional grants of power to save the Confederation from perishing.

When, afterward, these words were transferred from the Articles of Confederation into the Federal Constitution they were brought with their original meaning, which cannot be changed without violating well-settled principles of interpretation and the dictates of common sense. In their original use they did not define a grant, but the objects of a previous grant of power; and, when put into the present Constitution in a like connection to the same power as when originally used, we are bound to refer them to the previous grant of the tax power as merely defining the object and purpose of its delegation, and they cannot now be interpreted to constitute a separate and distinct grant of power.

But, sir, I am not left upon this subject to grope in the dark and without authority. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRANE] was on the same track as myself, and he has quoted the language of Mr. Madison as authority. I quote it for a higher purpose. I quote it, sir, because it is found in The Federalist, a work written in order to induce the adoption of the Federal Constitution. It is, therefore, not only a contemporaneous exposition, but more. Gentlemen on the other side must concede that it was not only a contempore exposition, but an exposition held out as an inducement to the people to adopt the Constitution. If you adopt a different interpretation of its words from that put upon them by Madison, you will commit a fraud upon the people who adopted them, upon a false representation of their meaning.

Now, what does Mr. Madison say? I read again the passage read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania this morning, and I beg attention to it. I read from the forty-first number of The Federalist:

> Some who have not denied the necessity of the power of taxation have grounded a very fierce attack against the Constitution on the language in which it is defined. It has been urged and echoed that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," amounts to an unlimited commission to exercise every power which may be alleged to be necessary for the common defense or general welfare. No stronger proof could be given of the distress under which these writers labor for objections than their stooping to such a misconstruction.

The committee will observe that what Madison calls a misconstruction to which no worthy objector should stoop is the very construction to which gentlemen now resort in order to give a force to these words, which, before the Constitution was adopted and in order to secure its adoption, Madison assured the people it was not susceptible of.

Now see what he further says:

> Had no other enumeration or definition of the power of the Congress been found in the Constitution than the general expression just cited, the authors of the objection might have had some color for it, though it would have been difficult to find a reason for so awkward a form of describing to legislate in all possible cases. A power to destroy the freedom of the press, the trial by jury, or even to regulate the course of descents, or the forms of conveyances, must be very singularly expressed by the terms "to raise money for the general welfare."
> But what color can the objection have when a specification of the object alluded to by these general terms immediately follows, and it is not even separated by a larger pause than a semi-colon. If the different parts of the same instrument ought to be so expounded as to give meaning to every part which will bear it, shall one part of the same sentence be excluded altogether from a share in the meaning, and shall the more doubtful and indefinite terms be retained in their full extent, and the clear and precise expresssions be denied any significance whatsoever?
> For what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power? Nothing is more natural or common than first to use a general phrase and then to explain and qualify it by a recital of particulars.
> But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning, and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead, is an absurdity which we are reduced to the dilemma of charging either on the authors of the objection or on the authors of the Constitution, we must take the liberty of supposing, had not its origin with the latter
> The objection here is the more extraordinary as it appears that the language used by the convention is a copy from the Articles of Confederation. The objects of the union among the States, as described in article 3, are, "Their common defense, security of their liberties, and mutual and general welfare." The terms of article 8 are still more identical: "All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury," &c. A similar language again occurs in article 9. Construe either of these articles by the rules which would justify the construction put on the new Constitution, and they vest in the existing Congress a power to legislate in all cases whatsoever. But what would have been thought of that assembly if, attaching themselves to these general expressions, and disregarding the specifications which ascertain and limit their import, they had exercised an unlimited power of providing for the common defense and general welfare? I appeal to the objectors themselves whether they would in that case have employed the same reasoning in justification of Congress as they now make use of against the convention. How difficult it is for error to escape its own condemnation.

Now, sir, there is the language of Mr. Madison before the Constitution was adopted. He put his emphatic reprobation upon any attempt before the Constitution was adopted and afterward to give to these words "general welfare" any meaning which would give unlimited powers to Congress, or any other meaning than merely to declare the object of the previous grant of power.

I ask, is it fair to give to them now a meaning which the people were then assured they could not bear, and on which assurance the people waived the objection and ratified the Constitution?

Now it is a remarkable fact that, in the convention which formed the Constitution, Alexander Hamilton, whose early fate was a cause of lament at least to one portion of the old federal party, proposed, as Mr. Madison reports it, that Congress should have power "to pass all laws which they shall judge necessary to the common defense and general welfare of the Union." I hope the advocates of this measure will hear this; for the proposition made by Hamilton in reference to the powers of Congress, and which was rejected, is your only show of authority to pass this centennial appropriation. Mr. Hamilton proposed that Congress should have power to pass all laws which they should judge necessary to the common defense and general welfare of the United States. Now suppose that proposition had been adopted in that form. But, instead of being adopted, it was rejected, and the present formal enumeration of powers was inserted in lieu of this general and sweeping clause.

If this Congress has the sweeping power to provide for the general welfare and to do whatever it may judge to be necessary therefor, this Government becomes at once vested with unlimited power. We may then throw up our hands and never say again that Congress has not the power to do anything it pleases. I know no other limitation, no other breakwater to the unrestricted authority of Congress to absorb all the reserved powers of the States and to become a centralized despotism, if such a construction of these words be admitted. My only hope to arrest consolidation is in limiting the power of Congress to the specifications of the grants contained in the Federal Constitution.

But gentlemen, despairing of finding any particular clause of the Constitution for their purpose have asked me how we could build this beautiful Dome to the Capitol. Now, if gentlemen will read the Constitution of the United States, and study it, and, as the Prayer-Book says, "inwardly digest it," they will find this provision in the sixteenth clause of the eighth section of article 1 of the Constitution:

> To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

Thus there is a clear implication of a grant of power to erect a capitol. But gentlemen say, "Why did you not build a brick building? Would not that have done?" Well, I might say, why did you not build it of weather-boards? Somebody else might say, "Why did you not build merely a log house? Why do you not live like the old patriarchs, in tents? What is the use of having any house at all?" I answer that the power being given to build "needful buildings," the discretion as to what is the necessity of the Government is of course left to Congress. And in reference to that I will answer, as poor old Lear did to his miserable daughters when they undertook by reasoning to deprive him of his royal dignities and reduce him to dependence upon the mercies of "a thankless child:"

> "O, reason not the need:
> * * * *
> Allow not nature more than nature needs,
> Man's life is cheap as beast's."

And when gentlemen ask how these pictures can come here, I will say to them that if they will read the later decisions of the higher courts of Great Britain they will find that the doctrine held by those courts is that pictures and statuary, intended as parts of the general plan of a building, are a part of the realty. Pictures are fixtures, and are as much needed to a public building as a cornice, a portico, or a dome. That is the way in which the picture of George Washington is constitutionally a part of this Capitol—this needful building. I venture further to say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who spoke on that question the other day, that Washington, in the eye of the law, was a perjured rebel. As he was an officer in His Majesty's army, I take it for granted that he had sworn to serve the Crown faithfully, and afterward he went into rebellion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Did Washington hold a commission in the British army when the war of the Revolution broke out?

Mr. TUCKER. No.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the point.

Mr. TUCKER. Then his oath of allegiance held good only so long as he held a commission?

Mr. GARFIELD. When his commission expired.

Mr. TUCKER. When he resigned.

Mr. GARFIELD. He did not resign.

Mr. TUCKER. He did resign.

Mr. GARFIELD. He was not an officer in the Army at the time.

Mr. TUCKER. He did resign; the gentleman does not know the history of his own country. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Did he resign to take service against the Crown?

Mr. TUCKER. O, no. But he resigned, and afterward took service in the rebellion. When the gentleman was speaking of perjury the other day he spoke of those in the South who resigned and afterward took service in the civil war on the confederate side.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend will allow me to correct him. I did not speak of those who resigned their commissions and afterward took service against the Union. I spoke of those who yet being under oath contemptuously struck against us without resigning, as many of them did, with their oaths still on their souls.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not know of any such persons. If the gentleman had the other day so qualified his remark as he has explained it to-day, I would not have now referred to him. My only vindication now—I need no vindication, for it is in my own conscience—my reason for referring to what he said was that I represent on this floor a little town where sleep the remains of one of the noblest Americans that ever trod its soil. He sleeps in death, and no dishonor can ever, expressly or by implication, be cast upon that honored grave that the Representative of that district will not rise here and repel it.

Now to coma back to the question about the pictures here, from which I have been led away, (I do not say intentionally.) According to the decisions of the highest courts, as I have said; these pictures are fixtures, and therefore they are a part of this building. What is a needful building therefore involves the question, what fixtures are needful to make it a proper place in which to hold the sessions of the Congress of the United States? Upon that question Congress has a discretion on which the Constitution puts no limit.

Somebody has asked about embassadors; I think somebody on the street the other day asked me the question. I do not know that it has appeared in this debate. What authority was there for expenditures for the entertainment of the Chinese and Japanese embassadors? I will say to gentlemen that if they will read the Constitution carefully they will find that power is given in it to the President of the United States "to receive public ministers and embassadors."—Constitution United States, article 2, § 3.

Then the power is given to Congress—

To pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers—

That is, the powers granted to Congress—and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

So that the power of Congress to pass a law necessary and proper for giving the President authority to receive embassadors in an appropriate way is clearly within the very letter of the Constitution.

Now I look at another point. One gentleman asked about the exploration of the Polar Sea, the observation of the transit of Venus, and the support of a Government Observatory. These things are clearly done under the power to provide and maintain a navy, because the provision and maintenance of a navy require that these scientific matters as to the geography of the earth and the celestial mechanism, having obvious relation to the navigation of the great deep, may be known, in order that our Navy may traverse the seas and oceans of the world safely to itself, and as a security to our vast foreign and home commerce. The exploration of the Polar Sea is legitimate either under the power to provide and maintain a navy or the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Wherever the enterprise of American seamen carries them, there must be safety for the Navy of the United States, and it is the business of the Government to protect the American shipper the world over from the dangers incident to those who do business on the great waters.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Does the gentleman deny that the people of the United States constitute one nation and the Government thereof a national government?

Mr. TUCKER. O! well, sir, that is not a centennial question.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Does the gentleman object to answering the question?

Mr. TUCKER. I do, sir, object to answering it now.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Ah!

Mr. TUCKER. Let me tell the gentleman that if he supposes there is any question which he can put to me that I will seek to evade, he is vastly mistaken.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Then I should be glad to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. TUCKER. Well, sir, the gentleman cannot put me to an answer except by my courtesy.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I did not desire to do so.

Mr. TUCKER. Knowing my rights on that point, I am not to be led away from the subject under discussion to answer what to me appears to be an idle question in respect to the present debate.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I did not intend to divert the gentleman from the subject.

Mr. TUCKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, something was said the other day about these grants of public lands for educational purposes. My friend from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] if he will permit me to call him so—I will call him so whether he permits it or not—said something yesterday about this Government being confessedly an educator of the people. Confessedly! Confessedly by whom? I never confessed it. I not only do not confess it, but I deny it in toto. What! is it pretended that this Government can intrusively control the common schools of every State of this Union; that it can enter your State, sir, or mine, and fix up or manipulate the common-school system according to the views of gentlemen here who know and can know nothing in the world about them?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I certainly intended to convey no such impression. Probably I was very inaccurate in my expression, but the only thing I intended to say on that point was that it is one part of the mission of this Government—a mission which it has heretofore in some measure performed—to promote education and things looking to the education of the people, but not to take control of the subject.

Mr. TUCKER. I did not mean to say anything that would even put my friend to an answer. I only wish to remind my democratic friends that this Government has no mission except to execute its powers and perform its duties under and in subjection to the supreme law of the land, the Constitution of the country. In that connection my friend referred to grants of land for educational purposes. I think the gentleman will find that wherever that has been a conceded power, it has been upon the ground that as the public lands were granted or have been acquired for the common benefit of all the States of the Union and as the duty is devolved upon Congress of forming out of these Territories new States that may come into the Union, it is essential that in building up these nurseries of States—in training that foster-child of the Government, the Territory, until it shall be a full-grown State, it is essential that there should be grants of public lands to the Territory for purposes of education; and those grants of public lands being made in the State wherein they lie, I suppose it was considered fair on the part of the Government that there should be grants of land to the old States for like purposes, in order that thus the donations of land should be made among the old and new States for the equal and common benefit of all. That is my answer to that question.

I have done with the constitutional question, as my time will not allow me to go into it further. I put it upon this ground: Show me the granted power or how this bill is necessary and proper to carry into effect an expressly granted power, or before God and under my oath I cannot vote for it.

Talk about sentimental patriotism! I have as much of it as most people, but my sentimental patriotism will not allow me to trifle with the solemn obligation I took at the Speaker's desk when I was sworn in as a member of this House.

Now, sir, I put it on another ground—and I beg my democratic friends around me to hear me, and I beg the gentlemen on the republican side of this Chamber to hear me—I put it on the ground that the only limit to this growing corruption in the country is a limitation upon the power of the Government. If you would advertise to this country that any scheme that a plausible committee or commission can induce gentlemen to strain themselves up to the point of believing to be for the general welfare is open to the exercise of power by this Congress, I tell you, sir, it will be an advertisement for jobbers; and the lobby will be so filled that its agents "will push us from our stools," and drive its members from this House. But whenever it comes to that the people of the country will say, thank God, they shall not sit here any longer! Whenever you claim power to do anything which you may judge for the general welfare, you proclaim to the country and to all its schemers and jobbers this invitation: "Have any of you any scheme you think for the general welfare? If so, bring it forward!" There will be no lack of them, sir, and the lobbyists out there will corrupt this body if it is corruptible. Your credit mobiliers, your railroad schemes, and all your other thousand plans for plunder upon the public Treasury and upon the tax-paying and the tax-burdened people of the land will be without remedy. There is only one remedy, and that is to limit power; but there is no limitation of power, if this Government can do anything it pleases upon the ground of "general welfare."

Mr. Chairman, I will not trespass upon the patience of the House further than to say this, that in every country there may be an ultimate analysis of all its great interests into two classes: the tax-consumer and the tax-payer, and as Lord Bacon once said about the wolf and the sheep, "The sheep are never too many for the wolf;" so you will find the multiplication of jobs under your indefinite and unlimited claim of power will never be too great for the tax-consumer. The man who feeds at the Federal crib does not care how much taxation is wrung from the pockets of hard-working people at home so he is filled and he is fattened.

I believe the mission of this Government at this time is economy, retrenchment, and reform. I know there is nothing in the world so hard as to make an available speech for economy against sentimental patriotism. Gentlemen who are here representing tax-paying constituents are exceedingly liberal with other people's money, and entirely opposed to economy when the expenditure does not touch their own pockets. I believe we have come to that period of time in the history of this Government when it becomes us to put the brakes down and to call a halt in lavish expenditure. And if the tax upon my constituents is only one cent more, and is imposed to carry out an unconstitutional scheme—I will not say job, but to carry out an unconstitutional scheme—I will remember the adage that "it is the last feather that breaks the camel's back;" and I for one shall vote against it.

But my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] said it is a very little tax, only three and a half cents; and my friends all around me re-echo the cry, only three and a half cents per capita. My friend before me from Illinois, who belongs to that department in this aviary in which we are assembled denominated the spread-eagle, and who delivered so fine a speech this morning, asks "Where is the man who will not give three and a half cents for the glory and honor of his country?" [Laughter.] Why, sir, that is all very fine, but I will remind my friend and I will remind this House of those most eloquent words uttered by one of the most eloquent men who ever spoke the English tongue, in his great speech on American taxation. I will remind them that Edmund Burke said "No man ever doubted the commodity of tea would bear the imposition of three pence." "Would twenty shillings," said he, "have ruined Mr. Hampden's fortune? No, but the payment of half twenty shillings on the principle it was demanded would have made him a slave!" And I say, sir, to make me or my constituents pay one cent upon the principle this bill demands—that is, that you can go outside of the Constitution to do it—will make my people slaves. And Edmund Burke added that it was not the weight of the duty but the weight of the preamble that claimed the right to impose it that the Americans were unable and unwilling to bear. That is the principle here. I do not care about three and a half cents, but I will tell my friend from New York that he cannot assure me or this country that when he gets his scheme in for three and a half cents some one else may not come the next day and say, "We also want to have a big show down at Yorktown, or we want to have a great show at Bunker Hill or Chicago. [Laughter.]

Well, why not have a great show at Chicago? "O, you have got no constitutional power." "Ah, none at all? You passed the centennial bill yesterday. Show what is the difference between the two. It will be only three and a half cents more. That would not hurt anybody." But another comes along and says, "I will not let that scheme get through unless mine gets through, too, and mine will only be three and a half cents more." It is well, Mr. Chairman, to remember the canny Scotch proverb, "Monie a mickle maks a muckle." It is the accumulation of the little expenditures that makes up the burdens which oppress the people of the country and paralyze their industries.

You have declared in a late resolution with great unanimity on the other side of the Chamber, and with some dissension on this, that subsidies to private corporations are a thing we are too pure to indulge in. But yet, sir, so soon as a private corporation comes here and asks a subsidy for its enterprise, because it calls itself a centennial corporation, and talks spread-eagle and sentimental patriotism, we say, "O, it would be unpatriotic to refuse it." There is logic for you!

Now, sir, I am opposed altogether to splendid governments. It is old-fashioned, sir, to say it; but I am old enough to be old-fashioned. I am opposed to a splendid government, and to a squalidly poor people. I am opposed to seeing the tax-consumer reveling in palaces and in luxury while I hear the wail of woe that comes from this tax-burdened people all over the land. I am opposed to it. It is the mission of this House, it is the mission of my political friends around me here to say, This thing must and shall cease. Right here and now, upon the altar of what we believe to be our duty to our people, we will immolate even this sentimental patriotism, and in doing it we will go back to the simple virtues and habits and customs of our forefathers a hundred years ago. We will go back to obeying the law, and will learn the lesson which the good book teaches.

When Saul, the King of Israel, was ordered by the God of Israel to destroy the whole of a particular nation, and all their wealth and pride, in order that there might be no plundering, (for there were plunderers and jobbers in that day, too, I have no doubt,) he determined to save the best of the cattle and the best of the flock, and to do honor to God, which was doing honor to theocratic patriotism, by making great sacrifices on the altars in the temple. When Samuel, the prophet, came and saw it, Saul boasted of what he had done for the glory of God and the honor of his country, and sought thus to propitiate his approval and avoid his rebuke. But Samuel met him with these solemn words: "Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams!" To obey the Constitution of the country is better than immolations to sentimental patriotism; and Almighty God and our people will be better satisfied with obedience than with our splendid ceremonial. Can we justly put more burdens on this people?

Now, on this subject, I have here what is fitted to my hand in the message of the present governor of New York, who makes a statement, and I have no doubt it is accurate, showing the large increment of taxation in this country in the last twenty years.

He shows that in 1850 the sum-total of the taxation of all kinds, Federal, State, and municipal, was $83,000,000; in 1860 it was $154,000,000; in 1870 it was $730,000,000. Thus while the tax per capita was $3.57 in 1850 and $4.80 in 1860, it was in 1870 $18.91 per head. And gentlemen talk about increasing it! Now, I am not prepared to do that thing, and I cannot. Gentlemen may do so who represent wealthy constituencies in the North and West. Chicago, I have no doubt, is rich enough to send a million and a half to the Centennial.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for a single moment. There were some other views I desired to express, and to ask leave to print them.

Mr. COX. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Virginia may be extended, as he has been interrupted by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman's time being extended.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I have no objection, if it does not cut me off.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will indicate what extension of time he wants. It is important that some limits should be put upon the debate, as there are so many names on the list of gentlemen desiring to speak.

Mr. TUCKER. I think I will complete what I wish to say in ten minutes.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the gentleman's time be extended fifteen minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TUCKER. I am very much obliged to the gentlemen on the other side who are under no obligations to me of a personal or political character, and to my friends around me, for this extension of time. I shall not, I hope, misuse the indulgence which the House has shown me.

Now, sir, in reference to this whole matter, I have to say that we need, as is urged upon us by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the President of the United States, in order to resume specie payments, that there shall be a surplus in the Treasury, arising from economy in the administration of public affairs.

What this country needs for its prosperity is that the obstruction of taxation should be taken off from the wheels of enterprise. I say, therefore, that just here we must practice economy; practice it in reference to this bill by denying ourselves the appropriation for this great luxury. We must lift the paralysis from the limbs of industry, and we must accumulate money by economy as a means by which to return to specie payments and a sound constitutional currency.

Now, sir, these rules of economy are often spoken of lightly, and almost with derision. But I remember in my readings to have been struck with the saying of a French king, Louis XII, "I would rather that my courtiers should laugh at my parsimony than that my people should weep at my prodigality." And we had better be subjected to the jeers of those who speak contemptuously of our undue economy than impose additional weights upon an already overburdened people.

Gentlemen say that the Government is committed in this matter. I am willing to leave that argument where my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRANE] put it.

There is not an act of Congress from 1871 down to 1874, as he has shown, when Congress has not said and provided that the United States are not to be responsible for any part of this expense. In the last act passed by Congress on this subject, on the last day of the last session of Congress, to be found in chapter 130, section 5, where an appropriation is made of $505,000 for the purpose of enabling the Departments to take part in the Centennial, I find these provisions:

And provided further, That the sums hereby appropriated shall cover the entire expense to which the United States Government shall be subjected on account of said exhibition, except the sum appropriated in this act for printing the certificates of stock of said exhibition; and the board on Executive Departments is forbidden to expend any larger sum than is set down herein for each Department, or to enter into any contract or engagement that shall result in any such increased expenditure; and no money shall be taken by any Department for the purposes of this exhibition as aforesaid from any other appropriations except the one hereby made.

It is true this act only applies to the Departments and not to the Centennial Commission; but Congress hedged itself in from all responsibility for any further expenditures. And that is the last act of Congress, passed on the last day of the last session. And yet with this full in our faces gentlemen are coming forward at this session asking a million and a half. They say, "We did not cut our coat according to our cloth. We spent more money than we ought to have done." Well, sir, that is their own lookout. But they will see that there is power given them to remedy that. Here is a section of the act of June 1, 1872:

SEC. 8. That the centennial board of finance shall have authority to issue bonds, not in excess of its capital stock, and secure the payment of the same, principal and interest, by mortgage upon its property and prospective income.

Why, you have five million dollars' worth of property already. Mortgage it for a million and a half, and finish the work, and then pay your debts. And now, Mr. Chairman, look at the bill before the House in relation to the section just quoted, and to the following section, to which I beg the attention of the committee:

SEC. 10. That as soon as practicable, after the said exhibition shall have been closed, it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert its property into cash, and after the payment of all its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders, pro rata, in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock. And it shall be the duty of the United States Centennial Commission to supervise the closing up of the affairs of said corporation, to audit its accounts, and submit, in a report to the President of the United States, the financial results of the centennial exhibition.

So that when the property is sold under this last-quoted section the Government only comes in pro rata with the stockholders. The residuum after paying debts, out of proceeds of sale, would be for the benefit of the private stockholders, including the Government. The Government is not a stockholder, it is true; but it is provided in this bill that the Government shall come in pro rata with the other stockholders, so that they will get a larger dividend than under the provisions of the act I have quoted, then if they should borrow the million and a half they ask of us and mortgage their assets for its payment. The calculation is easily made.

In closing this discussion, Mr. Chairman, I thank the House for its indulgent attention. In regard to a remark of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] that this constitutional question may be used by some gentlemen to screen from criticism a vote against the dictates of patriotism, I have to say that the imputation has no weight with me. I am in my heart of hearts in favor of a centennial celebration. I have no objection to seeing, but rejoice to see, the progress that the United States have made, under the impetus of free institutions, in the arts and sciences, in manufactures and agriculture, and commerce and mining, and in all industrial pursuits. No, sir; although my own State lags behind in all these great elements of material progress, for reasons that I need not more than advert to, she has no envy of the prosperity of her sisters in the Union. If I know my own heart—and I think I speak for my friends from Virginia and from the South generally—we know no motive but patriotic interest in the prosperity and progress of the Union under and in conformity to the Constitution of our country; and I cannot permit any gentleman to impute to me any lack of patriotism which he claims for himself. If I had not felt I was fully prepared to perform my whole duties in the American Congress, and in equal step with patriotic gentlemen elsewhere, I never would have held a seat here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true that I shall vote against this bill, and for the reasons, sound as I think they are, which I have mentioned. But it is said that even old Virginia in her legislative halls has declined to make an appropriation for the Centennial, and gentlemen may be somewhat surprised at it. There were difficulties in her way. She remembered the language of the English chancellor, who said "it is not fit that a woman should shine in jewels when her husband's creditors are starving." Virginia is deeply indebted. She felt that in her present condition she ought not to contribute to the centennial fund. But, sir, there is another reason. There are constitutional difficulties in her way. Many persons think that the constitution of Virginia forbids it. And if gentlemen suppose that that is due to the obstructive character of the abstractions of old Virginia I will merely say that no such obstruction was ever in any constitution adopted by Virginia before that of 1867, which was rammed down our throats by the military agencies of the Federal power and we were forced to adopt it. There is a provision in that constitution which prevents the State of Virginia from laying taxes or raising any revenue for any purpose except to pay our debt and for the expenses of our government.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And this Congress ratified that constitution?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; and this Congress sanctioned and put that constitution on us.

But, Mr. Chairman, despite all these obstructions, Virginia will be there. Her people who are able to go will be there. She has given daughters to the Union, six fair daughters with wealth and plenty in their hands, who will go to the Centennial and represent the munificence and the patriotism of their aged and bereaved mother. And another daughter, her mountain child, torn from her by the Cæsarian operation, will be present, with her infinite mineral wealth and her resources in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. And old Virginia, rent in twain, impoverished, in her weeds of widowhood, but with a heart throbbing high for the prosperity of the common country, with a soul as true to the constitutional Union as when she first proposed independence to her sisters, and declared it by the pen of her Jefferson and won it by the valor and virtue of her Washington, and as when by the wisdom and prudence of her Madison she lent her aid to frame the Federal Constitution. Yes, true to the principles of liberty and independence and honor, Virginia will be there in spirit hovering over the scene. And I say to this House, that when this Government is restored to its pristine purity, and the principles of the Revolution are re-established, and liberty shall be proclaimed throughout this land, in this year of our jubilee, to every man, even the humblest under the protecting ægis of the habeas corpus unrepealed by the edicts of a President, and unrepealable by a declaration of constructive rebellion under unconstitutional acts of Congress, and when Virginia and all her sister States shall be free in the direction of their internal polity, and be uncontrolled in their autonomy, then glowing with an inextinguishable love for liberty secured by the Constitution, which is the supreme law for Government and people, she will, if not in corporal presence, yet truly in spirit, unite with Massachusetts in that splendid aspiration of her greatest orator and statesman, uttered forty years ago, for liberty and union, that is, institutional liberties inherited from the struggles of the centuries and secured under the noble Constitution of our fathers—"Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable!" [Great applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will yield, I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. It was a bill to restore the postage on third-class mail matter to what it was before the law was changed at the last session. I ask that the committee now have authority to report a copy of that bill to take the place of the one which was lost.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 316) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. I would like to have the bill read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, under and by virtue of an act of the Congress of the United States approved the 1st day of July, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," the Government, in addition to its munificent land-grant of —— acres, loaned to the Pacific railway companies mentioned in said act, and the subsequent acts amendatory thereof, the aggregate sum of $64,623,512 in 6 per cent. bonds at thirty years, bearing interest payable semi-annually, to secure the payment of which a lien was retained upon the property and franchises of the several companies for the respective amounts loaned; and whereas by subsequent amendments to said acts the said companies were permitted to issue their first-mortgage bonds on their respective roads in amounts not to exceed the amount of bonds loaned to them by the United States Government, which bonds should be a lien upon said road, superior to the lien of the United States; and whereas the said companies refused to re-imburse the United States Treasury for interest already paid on said bonds amounting now to over $20,000,000, and decline to pay any interest until the maturity of the bonds, while some of said companies are declaring dividends to stockholders; and whereas the interest on the bonds loaned to these companies will amount, at their maturity, including compound interest on the coupons as paid by the Government until that date to over $100,000,000; and whereas the official report of the Secretary of the Interior to the President of the United States exhibits the net earnings of said companies for the year ending June 30, 1875, as exceeding $15,000,000, being nearly 12 per cent. of the first-mortgage-bond debt which has precedence of lien over the bonds loaned these companies by the Government and the Government debt combined, showing unquestioned ability from earnings to pay the accruing interest to the Government; and whereas it was not the purpose of the Government in promoting and fostering these great national enterprises to postpone its own lien to the enriching of individual shareholders: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of sections 5 and 6 of the act of Congress approved the 1st day of July, 1862, and of which this is amendatory, as provides, either by their express terms or by their construction, that the railroad companies therein named shall not be required to pay interest on the United States bonds loaned to them by the terms of said act until the maturity of the bonds, as to re-imburse the Government for interest paid and to be paid by the Government on said bonds until the maturity of the bonds, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act said companies shall be liable to pay into the Treasury of the United States the whole amount of interest heretofore paid by the Government on the bonds loaned to said companies in aid of the construction of said railroads, together with interest upon the several sums paid by the Government in discharge of interest on said bonds at the rate of —— per cent. per annum from the date of payment, less the amount retained by the Government for the transportation of the mails from time to time, which shall be credited in the account every six months; and it shall be the duty of said companies respectively to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, ten days immediately preceding the maturity of semi-annual interest on the bonds respectively loaned them, such sums, added to the amount then due each company from the United States on account of the mail service and use of telegraph lines, as will amount to the semi-annual interest then falling due.

Mr. WEST. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 317) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what steps have been taken, by any suit or otherwise, under the second section of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1873; and whether, in any suit brought under said section, the claim of the United States for the 5 per cent. of net earnings therein mentioned was brought under adjudication and passed upon, and if not, why not; and that he also communicate the present condition of the matters therein referred to.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to communicate to the Senate what action, if any, has been taken by him under the act of Congress entitled "An act providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific railroad companies," approved June 22, 1874, and what is the present condition of the matters therein referred to.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate what steps, if any, have been taken by him under the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, and what is the present condition of the matters therein referred to.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to examine into the provisions of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, and amendments thereto, and report to the Senate whether, in their judgment, the provision requiring that a petition in cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy shall be by one or more creditors who shall constitute one-fourth thereof, at least, in number and the aggregate of whose debts provable shall amount to at least one-third of the debts so provable, applies in a case where the debtor is a corporation; or whether, in their judgment, under existing laws, a corporation debtor may be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy on the petition of a single creditor who does not constitute one-fourth in number of all the creditors and whose debt does not amount to one-third of the debts provable against such corporation.

I am advised that by a recent decision of the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon it has been held that the provision in amendment of the bankrupt law and incorporated into that law by the act of 1874, which provides, as I understand, in terms that a petition in case of involuntary bankruptcy shall represent at least one-fourth of all the creditors and whose debts in the aggregate provable against the bankrupt shall amount to at least one-third of all the debts provable, does not apply in a case where the debtor is a corporation. I will say, however, in justice to the court that I have not yet been able to get a copy of the opinion, and it is barely possible there may be some mistake about it. If such a decision has been made, I think it is very important that we should have the judgment of the Judiciary Committee on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions the morning hour has expired, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is temporarily out of his seat, but will be present soon.

Mr. EATON. As the Senator from Indiana is not in his seat, I desire to make a personal statement. I notice by the RECORD this morning certain remarks made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] which I did not hear yesterday. They certainly misrepresent me. I do not suppose that that Senator intentionally desired to misrepresent me. I will read what he said:

But if the whole purpose of this resolution is to ascertain whether there may not be some method of simplifying the books of the Treasury Department in the method which has come down to us from the beginning, it is very evident to me that the Committee on Finance is the proper committee to examine into the subject, more especially since we are informed by the Senator from Connecticut that he has devoted three weeks to an attempt to master the whole science of the Treasury and has utterly failed. If that be so, what expectation can we have that there is anybody else in the country who will be able to do it? He confesses himself his own belief that after this experiment on his part there is nobody in the whole nation able to comprehend the subject.

Now, I apprehend that the Senator from Massachusetts did not intend to say anything of that sort. It is an utter misrepresentation of what I said. He possibly did not understand me. I said that I had examined the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, the reports of the Register of the Treasury, the monthly reports of the public indebtedness, and that I could not, nor could any accountant, take those reports and say what the public debt of the United States was. I do not desire it to go to the country that I have been in the Treasury Department and made an examination into their mode of keeping books; nor can I believe the Senator from Massachusetts could so misrepresent my remarks intentionally.

Mr. DAWES. I should be very sorry to have misrepresented the Senator from Connecticut, and I regret very much if on reading what I said yesterday the Senator shall be of opinion that I did misrepresent him. I supposed he would infer, from reading those remarks, that the phrase which he has quoted should be judged by the context, and that I simply meant to say that I thought three or four weeks' examination of the subject would hardly afford us all the profit that could be derived from four years, for instance, of practical experience in it, and that was the drift of what I intended to say. The Senator himself is an experienced debater in this body; I am a novice; and if I misrepresented the Senator, I simply now desire to say that all I intended was to express the discouragement, on my own part, of any expectation that new men, or comparatively new men, could enter into an examination of the intricate book-keeping of the Treasury Department with any such hope of a successful result as we might fairly infer we could derive from a like examination of those who brought experience to it. I did not mean to make any invidious comparison between the Senator from Connecticut and any member of the Committee on Finance. I would not do it; certainly my relations with the Senator are such as to forbid me, even if I had any occasion to do so.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] for an investigation into the election in Mississippi. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

[Mr. MORTON addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the resolution proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The Chief Clerk read the resolution and the amendment submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr. DAVIS. Yesterday I was prepared to go on, expecting to proceed with the resolution, but as is the usual courtesy in such cases I gave way to the Senator from Indiana who desired to speak. This morning I was informed, not by the Senator himself but by friends of his, that he would consume the entire time to-day. Therefore I am not fully prepared to go on with this resolution now, and will give way for any other business that may be offered, my resolution taking its place as the unfinished business when the Senator from Indiana shall have finished his speech to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That must depend a little upon where we are. If the Senator is not ready to go on to-day, I move to postpone this question until to-morrow, and then I shall move, if my friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is not here, to take up the resolution providing for the adoption of the joint rules. I can assure the Senator from West Virginia that there will be no disposition to postpone the consideration of his resolution, but if we take up the joint-rule question now I think we had better stick to it until it is finished. We may finish it this afternoon. We ought to do so, I am sure.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that the Senator from Maine is not likely to be in the Senate for the remainder of the day.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand whether the Senator from Vermont made a motion or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; I move to postpone this matter until to-morrow, in order that I may move to take up the resolution in regard to the joint rules.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that.

JOINT RULES OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that all prior orders be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules on the 10th instant.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

The pending question being upon the amendment of Mr. MORTON, after the word "Congress," in the fourth line, to insert "excepting the twenty-second joint rule."

Mr. BAYARD. I submitted yesterday, Mr. President, a resolution as a substitute for the report of the committee, and if it be in order I should like to have it read now; and I ask whether, in the present stage of the consideration of the question, it can be offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's motion is in order.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I submit as an amendment to the resolution the substitute I offered yesterday, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to strike out all after the word "that" in the first line of the resolution and insert:

The Committee on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine and, after conference, to report what amendments, if any, should be made in the present joint rules of the two Houses; and also whether any, and what, legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the present twenty-second joint rule.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that offered as an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a substitute. The first question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] before the substitute is voted upon.

Mr. BAYARD. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, it is to adopt the joint rules of the two Houses, as they now stand, excepting the twenty-second.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President; the precise proposition is not to adopt the joint rules of the two Houses as they now stand, but to adopt the joint rules of the last session. Then the Senator from Indiana moves to amend that resolution by an exception. Now the Senator from Delaware offers a substitute for the whole thing; and as the Chair states it is clear that in order we must perfect the original resolution before we vote on the substitute, so that the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BAYARD. I had some doubt whether, pending the amendment to the original resolution, a substitute would be in order. I asked the Chair, and the information given me was that it would be in order. If now the decision of the Chair is that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana must be voted upon first, before my proposition can be considered, be it so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair replied to the Senator that his substitute was in order; but the rule requires that where a substitute is offered the text shall be perfected if the body sees fit to so perfect it. The Senator from Indiana having moved to perfect, the first question will be on his amendment. The proposition of the Senator from Delaware will still be pending, and when the text has been perfected the question will recur on the substitute of the Senator from Delaware. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to except the twenty-second joint rule.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendment be offered to the text of the resolution, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware as a substitute for the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the mover of this substitute whether to his knowledge there is any serious difficulty about either of the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives save the twenty-second joint rule?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know at all of difficulties as to other joint rules. I assume that the joint rules of the two Houses, which have been in existence almost from the foundation of the Government and have received the approval and sanction of those preceding us, will remain as they are. I take it for granted that this is the first time that an amendment or cancellation of the joint rules has been proposed, and I consider that the proper method of considering the subject is to submit it to a conference of the proper committees of each House; and then in regard to the twenty-second joint rule, upon which we have had some discussion, I submit to the Senate that the matters embraced in that rule should be acted on by legislation, and not by the joint rules of the two Houses.

Mr. CONKLING. No doubt the Senator from Delaware will anticipate the object of the inquiry I rise to make; and it is this: It strikes me, as I think it will strike the Senate, that if it be true, as the Senator and I agree, that there is no question about any of the joint rules save one, if the Senate proceeds to adopt the joint rules of the Senate and House all saving that one, then such motion as the Senator from Delaware makes or any other motion applicable to that one, to wit the twenty-second joint rule, will not only be in order, but will be unembarrassed by a general reference to the whole body of rules. In other words, I submit to the Senator that the way to advance the object he has in view, namely a consideration of the twenty-second joint rule, is to dispose of the rest and residue of the joint rules, and establish them, there being in regard to them no question and no objection.

It may very well be that after the vote shall be taken, it will be seen that the mode proposed by the Senator from Delaware will be preferable to any other mode of approaching and considering the question of the twenty-second joint rule; but I cannot see how it advances the purpose of the Senator from Delaware to embrace all these rules in name, when in reality there is but one at which his motion is actually aimed. So then, unless there be something that does not occur to me on this subject, I should vote against substituting the resolution of the Senator from Delaware for this resolution, my understanding being, that, failing to substitute it, it will be, as an independent motion of its own, unimpaired by the vote, which in the mean time might be taken, and in addition to that, separated and relieved from what really should not incumber it, and what the Senator agrees with me in supposing is well enough as it is.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to the twenty-second joint rule being referred to the Committee on Rules; perhaps that will be proper. I will say, however, that it is now pending in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and has been twice before that committee heretofore. That committee reported last session a substitute for the twenty-second joint rule in the form of a bill, which passed this body, and the same bill has been introduced this session. It is before the committee, and has been, I believe, partially considered. But if it is the will of the Senate to make this disposition of the subject, I shall be content.

Mr. BAYARD. As I stated in reply to the Senator from New York, I had nothing in contemplation in the way of interference or amendment with any of the existing joint rules of the two Houses except the twenty-second joint rule. As the question has been raised, it is of great importance that it should be properly settled. Gentlemen have differed on this floor in regard to the power of each House over the joint rules. A very ingenious and able presentation of the subject was made by the Senator from Ohio who sits near me, [Mr. THURMAN,] claiming that the House of Representatives was a continuing body, and that there was needed no adoption at the incoming of each new Congress of either the separate or the joint rules governing the preceding House. Having heard him and considered his point, I entirely dissent from his view. I believe that the House of Representatives is not a continuing body, and that, indeed, it is not only separate but that each House has its operative legal existence and would be without any rules until it has adopted the parliamentary rules of the preceding House, as is usually done. The proposition has been made here that, this being a joint rule, made by two contracting parties, neither can at will retire from the rule. That is a very grave subject. Gentlemen on this floor have admitted such a view, and declared that it required a joint consent to the rescission of a rule as much as to its formation; but from that proposition I entirely dissent. I cannot believe that, either under the language of the Constitution or the very theory of checks and balances which the two Houses were designed to enforce one upon the other, the independence of either House can be taken from it, either by its own act or an act of the other House. Therefore I hold, as these rules are made, they are made during the good pleasure of each House, and that it is in the power of either the Senate or House of Representatives to retire from a joint rule at any time, and simply give notice of that fact to the other branch of Congress.

But still the question has been made, and I think it would be advisable to have it settled by conference of the two Houses through their respective Committees on Rules. I cannot doubt that on examination they will come to the conclusion to adopt the whole code, if I may so call it, except this twenty-second joint rule, which is highly exceptionable. Therefore I do not think there is any necessity to apprehend embarrassment in treating this subject, because I have referred the matter to the two Houses. These points having been raised, I think they should be disposed of gravely and properly. I know no reason why there should not be an entire assent between the two branches on the subject; but the question having been raised, I think it is a good opportunity to have the subject considered.

I should vote now for the adoption of the joint rules of the two Houses, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, and I prefer to have the proposition made and considered in this formal and deliberate manner for the purpose of having the matter reviewed. It is a very grave subject. It has not been, so far as my researches enable me to discover, heretofore brought before the Senate in a manner that would admit of a clear decision, as it has been at the present time. There is no act of Congress on the subject. There is really nothing in the practice of the two Houses on the subject. I am not aware that any joint rule of the two Houses has ever been repealed. Such rules have been amended by the joint action of the two Houses, but I submit that as yet I know of no case where either House has elected to retire from a joint rule; and yet I cannot doubt the power of either House to do so. Still I think it would be well, as we are treating of these joint rules, if we should invite the co-operation of the other House. If I am right in that, there will be no embarrassment, because the whole subject of the rules will be referred to the committee.

But now we come to a more important part of the proposition, and that is that the committee are to report whether any, and what, legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the twenty-second joint rule. There seems to have been a lamentable want of discussion at the time of its adoption in 1865. The Senator from Indiana expressed his view of it, and that was very little. I think he stated that its author said that he had really forgotton that he had drafted it, and gave no reasons why he drafted it, and could give no reasons for the authority claimed and exercised by the two Houses of Congress on the subject of that rule. If that be so, and I cannot doubt it after the statement of the Senator from Indiana, the people of this country have in reality, for the last three presidential elections, had hanging over them a power in either branch of Congress to defeat the popular choice by a motion made and decided without debate by either House of Congress. So long as a certain political party held the control of the House of Representatives, so long, under this joint rule, they could, by raising any question, any pretext upon the count of a vote, upon a form of a certificate, have thwarted the popular will and have become themselves the electoral body of the President and Vice-President of the United States. It has not been a matter conceived in haste and corrected at leisure. It has been conceived in deliberation, continued deliberately from that day to this. Now that the political complexion and character of the other House of Congress has changed, it is seen that this terrible power of veto upon the popular will may be exercised by others than those whom it was intended to be exercised by.

Now, sir, upon this subject, immensely important as it is, I desire to say that, believing such an assumption of power to have been originally wrong, it cannot harden into right by acquiescence or by practice, and as this rule should never have had existence, as such powers were exercised at the last count of the presidential vote never could have been properly exercised, so I wish it to be destroyed and negatived by the action of Congress. Although I know that that party with whom I am in political affiliation has the power under this present twenty-second joint rule to declare, according to their will, who shall be the next President and Vice-President of the United States, they have no right to exercise such a power except in the contingency appointed by the Constitution; that is, the failure of any candidate receiving a majority of the electoral votes cast.

Sir, this question is one of the very gravest importance. True, the Constitution is unfortunately too silent. It provides simply that the President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses, and that the votes shall then be counted. Taking the words strictly, there is merely a ministerial duty on the part of the President of the Senate with his thumb and finger to tear off the seals of the envelopes and present the certificates of votes. He is not to count them. The Constitution does not say that he shall count them, but simply that he shall open the certificates, and that they shall be counted. By whom? Can it be that this grant of constitutional power shall be put in force by the machinery of a joint rule that has not the obligation of a law, and over which either House holds at its pleasure complete control? I cannot imagine a more dangerous state of affairs.

Suppose it should be held by the House of Representatives that it is not competent for the Senate at their will and without notice to retire from the twenty-second joint rule and that they will hold us to the exercise of it, you can see what a dangerous condition arises between the two Houses. It is one that should be settled before heat and excitement come, one that should be settled not in the spirit of party but by something far higher and more patriotic. Therefore it is that I believe that this power, scant though it be, obscure though the terms of its grant may be, is to be exercised by the aid of the machinery of legislation duly passed, that there should be the concurrent action of each House and the approval of the President just as the Constitution requires his assent to any bill that may be presented. Therefore it is that I hope this substitute of mine may meet the approval of gentlemen of all political views in this Senate.

It is not worth while to speculate now on the possible tribunal in whom this judicial power, this power of discretion in regard to counting the votes, should be reposed. There can scarcely be a more important question for decision than that; but certain it is that it ought not to be left where it is now; it ought never to have been placed as it is now. For the last eleven years we have been living under this rule, and we have been living really under a Government not warranted by the Constitution. Powers have been claimed, powers have been exercised over this vital subject of determining the choice of the people, which ought never to have been claimed or exercised.

Sir, I hope that the proposition which I have moved in this shape will meet the approval of Senators on all sides of the Chamber, and that if it is necessary—and I believe it is—that the scant language of the Constitution should receive the aid of legislation in order to make it operative, it should be done in the forms of law and not under the form of a mere rule of consent which has no other existence than the pleasure of each House. For that reason I trust the amendment I have offered as a substitute for the resolution will meet the assent of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg leave to suggest to my friend from Delaware, whose views on this subject in a very considerable degree agree with my own, that he withdraw this substitute at present and let us adopt the joint rules of the last session excepting the twenty-second, which we have already voted out. He and I both agree that at this moment we have no joint rules.

Mr. BAYARD. Pardon me; I did not say so, because the other House has not retired from the joint rules. The House, I understand, has adopted these very joint rules at the present session. The Senate is a continuing body, and therefore I do not think it is necessary for us to express their adoption.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I do not understand the answer. I understood the Senator to say that he did not believe in the power of any parliamentary body to bind its succeeding body, whether it be a popular body in the constitutional sense or a parliamentary body whose term of office has expired. I supposed he thought it could not set up a law for its successor which could bind that successor until there should be votes enough to change it. Whether the House of Representatives has adopted these joint rules at this present session or not I do not know. I have no knowledge of it. I have never seen any such statement.

Mr. BAYARD. Not in the record of debates?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I saw in the record of debates a motion to adopt the rules of the last House of Representatives; I did not see anything else. If there was a motion to adopt the joint rules of the preceding session, we ought to have been notified of that first. We have received no such notice. That I am sure of, and I am sure my friend from Delaware will see when he looks at the RECORD that it was the adoption of the House rules proper alone. That being the state of the case, we have not, as my friend and I both agree, any joint rules. We all agree, as the practice has been, that joint rules may be adopted by acquiescence, by acting under them without objection. Some of them provide for intercourse between the two Houses, and it may be that acting under one would not imply an adoption of another. I do not really think it would; but in drifting along in this way we are liable to be met by and by in one House or the other with the suggestion, "You have already got your joint rules for this session, however clear the law may have been that you had not any when you began your session, and it is now too late to make objection; and therefore you cannot change the twenty-second joint rule without the consent of both parties." I do not agree with my friend from Delaware that in a particular session, when the joint rules have been adopted by the concurrence of the two Houses, either may retire at its own will by simply giving notice to the other party. I do not think that is the law. I cannot see any foundation for such a proposition as that. We might as well say that any member of this body can retire from the observance of rules as soon as it displeases him. Of course two governments treating with each other may retire from a treaty; but, unless the treaty provides for retiring from it, they retire from it by breaking it. Of course if either House, as a mere matter of power, without regard to right, (which must be supposed to govern both Houses,) should say "We will disobey a joint rule which declares that messages from the House of Representatives shall be received through their Clerk, and that messages for the Senate shall be received there by our Secretary," the remedy might be difficult to find.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will allow me, I beg to suggest that the first thing to do, to make sure, is to get rid of the twenty-second joint rule, and after we have done that, this will come in necessarily as a new resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend had waited a minute he would have found it unnecessary to make that suggestion. I was coming to that as fast as my slow way of doing things would allow. I was endeavoring to illustrate the necessity of doing what the Senator from Indiana has suggested by showing that at this present moment this terrible joint rule, as it is called, is not binding on either House. We have not any such rule; we have not any other joint rule; and yet we are every day doing things in accordance with some of the joint rules of the last session. My friend says that we may retire from these joint rules of our own volition without the consent of the other party. I do not think we can do that if they are adopted at this session, but if none of them are in force, of course there is nothing to retire from. We may disobey the rules and refuse to receive the Clerk of the House of Representatives. That is abolition, not retiring. We have no right to do it, in my opinion; but the point now is that we have, by a unanimous vote of this body, expressed our disposition not to readopt the twenty-second joint rule as a joint rule of the two bodies, as it now stands. The Senator from Delaware agrees with us all that there is nothing else in the joint rules of the last session which requires special investigation, or to which there is any special objection. Let us, therefore, as the simplest thing in the world, adopt the joint rules of the last session, omitting this one. Then we have a set of joint rules covering all subjects of our mutual intercourse. Then, as he says himself, the subject of counting the electoral votes for President is one that must be proceeded with on the basis of legislation, and not on the basis of a rule; and if we are to proceed with it on the basis of legislation, then we must inquire into it by a legislative committee, in the ordinary course of things, and have a bill reported.

So, then, I submit to my friend, with great deference to his views, that the simplest and clearest thing to it at this moment is not to press the substitute but to adopt the joint rules of the last session, omitting this one, and then we shall have a clear field with the legislative inquiry which he himself proposes and which is so desirable to us all.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have no disposition to change any of the joint rules except the twenty-second, and I do not know that any one in either House has. The object for which I offered the amendment was to have the question of the powers of the two Houses over their joint rules examined and reported upon, and reported after a conference in regard to what legislation is expedient in regard to the matters embraced in the twenty-second joint rule. I have no objection to this resolution if it be amended in that way. It is of interest, of course, but it may not be important at this moment to decide as to the power of the Senate over the joint rules of the two Houses. The Constitution, on the subject of the rules, gives to each House the power to determine the rules of its proceeding. The very force of that word "determine" certainly is to put an end to any rule they may adopt. As to joint rules it says nothing; but as part of the business of the two Houses is concurrent, the power would be implied in each House to make rules for cases where its proceedings touch the proceedings of the other body as well as where they were confined to the action in the body itself. The power of each House to make rules having been expressly given by the Constitution, nothing more is to be implied; for I believe it is a safe rule that you are not to infer an implied grant of power from an express grant.

My present disposition is, with deference of course to the Senator from Vermont, to differ from him in regard to the power of the House at any time to retire from a joint rule on giving notice. Otherwise they would be tied up for the session irrevocably to a joint rule which, because it was a joint rule, had a binding effect which other rules could not have. The Senate cannot deprive itself of its power over its own rules; it cannot delegate any portion of this power to another branch of Congress; and it has no right to deprive itself of its power given to it for its own exercise in its sound discretion.

Therefore it is that I believe it is within the power of the Senate—I mean within the constitutional power of the Senate—to retire from any joint rule at will, under the forms prescribed by themselves for amendment and alteration of the law. I believe this idea is in furtherance of the necessary independence of each House of Congress from the other, in order to form a check on the action of the other, for this was designed to be a Government in which various checks should constantly interpose upon the power of each House. Each House was created with particular powers for the purpose of preserving those checks and balances in the Government. But I am anxious that the question shall be considered, and considered now by the respective Committees on Rules of the two Houses. I have no idea that there will be found any necessity for amending any of the rules but the twenty-second joint rule, and that, I believe, had better be tried, because it is leaving that subject under the machinery of a rule which ought to be dealt with only under the machinery of a law regularly enacted.

If it be the object of the Senate to repeal the twenty-second joint rule and to leave the naked language of the Constitution, insufficient and meager as it has been found to be, to stand in doubt and obscurity until the next count of the presidential votes, then I shall say they will fall very far short of their duty in my opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg to assure the Senator that I have no such object. My object is to have the joint rules which are not embarrassed with the twenty-second adopted, and then to provide by legislation, as we attempted to do at the last session; and I think my friend's opinion and my own came very nearly together on the general topic, for that contingency, and leave the joint rules disembarrassed of this one for the time being.

Mr. BAYARD. What is the objection to allowing this question of the rules to be settled by a report of the two committees, after conference? The subject of the power of each House over the joint rules is before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My objection is that the very substitute implies that the joint rules, the twenty-second and all, are now in force—a proposition from which I totally dissent.

Mr. BAYARD. As a question of fact, I do not propose to join issue with my friend on that subject, because he is more apt to be right than I in regard to the action of the House. I was endeavoring to find by the RECORD the action of the House on the subject of rules. I find that other gentlemen near me have the same impression I have, that there was, by the House, an adoption of the joint rules as well as the rules of the House itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have never seen it if there is anything of the kind.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask the Senator from Vermont if an amendment was not incorporated into the report of the House Committee on Rules, inserting the words "with the consent of the Senate," when they notified us of the adoption of the rules?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator from Virginia ask me a question?

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the Senator's recollection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As far as I have seen any evidence of the action of the House of Representatives at all which was in the RECORD, all I saw was that on the motion of a gentleman from Pennsylvania the rules of the last House of Representatives, excepting certain ones which they did not wish to adopt, were adopted as the rules of the present House, and no reference was made to the joint rules. There was none that I saw; I am sure of that.

Mr. WITHERS. My impression is different, arising from the fact (which I have not been able to verify by reference to the RECORD on the subject) that there was an amendment moved "with the concurrence of the Senate," which I thought implied that action had been had on the joint rules as well as the separate rules of the House.

Mr. BAYARD. If there be no objection, I ask that the matter lie over informally. I think it is important.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my friend that this is merely a proposition to the House of Representatives to adopt these rules, which we all agree ought to be adopted, except the twenty-second joint rule. If they have already adopted the joint rules, it is a proposition to them to adopt them again without that one. I am sure, as a matter of fact, that my friend will not find in the RECORD any action of the present House of Representatives upon the joint rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 26.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the resolution by adding to it—

And that the Committees on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine and, after conference, to report whether any and what legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the present twenty-second joint rule.

That relieves the resolution which I first offered from the embarrassment which the Senator from Vermont seemed to apprehend, and merely requires the committees to report their views to Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my friend from Delaware that if he will offer that as an independent proposition after this matter is disposed of, so as to get some joint rules to act under now, his proposition, except so far as it relates to the legislative branch of the affair, would meet my entire concurrence. I have not the least objection to it; but it seems to me to be embarrassing a perfectly simple question in adopting the old joint rules by adding an amendment which does not provide for their adoption and leaves the whole thing open until we shall have, in the course of a month, an inquiry.

While I am up, if the Senator will pardon me because I am taking his time, I will say that I have found, through the kindness of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] on page 9 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the 7th of December, an entry of the action of the House of Representatives upon the rules, and I hope in reading the proceedings of the House of Representatives I shall be pardoned on this occasion, although, except on a question of joint rules, it might be out of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered, except Rule 166 and Rule 167."

Then he provides for a committee on rules it is not necessary to read. Therefore the Chair will perceive, as well as my friend from Delaware, that there can be no question at all that that action of the House of Representatives related to its own rules, and not to the joint rules. It says so in its terms. And if it were possible to hold that the rules of the House of Representatives included the joint rules, that possibility is excluded by the fact that two of the rules referred to are named as the rules of the House proper, Rules 166 and 167. This resolution, after discussion, was adopted on the statement of the Chair, with the assent of all hands, that nothing in the shape of rules of any preceding session, whatever they were, could have any force at all in that House until they were agreed to by the fresh body of men who had come in.

Mr. BAYARD. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to consider that the action of the Senate in adopting certain joint rules, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, is interfered with by the amendment I have offered?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand it so. I understand that we are left with no other question open on the whole joint rules, except that not adopted, until both parties agree. The amendment is that on that we shall have an investigation. I may not have understood the amendment, perhaps.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator has not understood the amendment. The amendment does not interfere with the action proposed by the Senate. His resolution proposes to do away with the present joint rules, except the twenty-second. I simply propose that the two committees shall report what legislation shall take the place of that joint rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the trouble is that the House of Representatives may not be willing to have a joint committee consider the rules, whereas we need joint rules every day; and if we send over a proposition there, it must be taken in solido. They cannot adopt the joint rules without debate, and the proposition to have a committee may there lead to discussion. Some gentlemen there may have views that differ from those we have here, and in the mean time we have no joint rules and the thing drags along. If the Senator proposes this as an independent proposition, as far as I can now see it will certainly get my vote.

Mr. MORTON. I think it is too important to get clear of the twenty-second joint rule to let this opportunity pass. The adoption of the resolution, as amended now, strikes down the present twenty-second joint rule, and we are done with it. The adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware will be construed to have the effect of an acquiescence in all the joint rules, including the twenty-second, and refers all of them to the action of the Committees on Rules hereafter. These committees may never agree, and there may never be an opportunity so favorable to strike down the twenty-second joint rule. Let us now strike down that rule by adopting the resolution, and then I am willing to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Delaware, and refer all the rules to a committee for revision. I think that is the safe thing to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Unless some Senator has business, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. I would ask unanimous consent to consider the resolution offered by me, and which has been discussed at the present time as an independent proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committees on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine and, after conference, to report whether any, and what, legislation is expedient in regard to the matters considered in the twenty-second joint rule of the last session.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection, as I think I intimated before, to this action as an independent proposition in the language of some other Senators. I suggest, however, that we are about to do an unwise thing if we adopt this; for this reason: We have adopted rules, and to which, so far as we know, there is no objection in either House. After the House of Representatives shall have adopted these rules, then I see no more objection than other Senators do to this resolution; but we send now to the House, if this resolution shall go there as well as the other, two resolutions, one proposing to adopt the joint rules, and at the same time a resolution proposing to refer the whole subject to the committees of the two Houses on Rules. What impression does this convey? In place of this coming afterward as an independent proposition to take effect, it may be now, that for the time being we have adopted these rules, it goes as part of our action; and the result may be to defeat what we have just been doing, and that probably will be the result. Now, I suggest that we send to the House the resolution we have just passed. If the House concurs in that, then we shall have the state of case to which the resolution of the Senator from Delaware is applicable. But if we arrest, as I think we probably shall do, the action already taken, by passing this resolution, it seems to me we defeat the very purpose we have in view.

As I have risen to make this suggestion, I venture to make also another. The whole theory of this, it seems to me, is contrary to parliamentary practice. The Senator from Delaware proposes virtually a conference committee; for so it becomes. What is the mission of a conference committee? To reconcile differences between the two Houses. Now surely until we know that there is a difference between the two Houses, we do not need a conference committee; and then we do not need it as to any matter upon which the two Houses are agreed. Therefore I suggest to the Senator from Delaware, being entirely friendly to his purpose, that he allow this resolution to lie over for the time being. If the House concurs in the resolution we have already adopted, his resolution needs no change whatever. If on the contrary it turns out that the House has objection to other of these joint rules which we have now adopted, that we ought to know; and in the presence of that fact we ought to adopt this resolution. So it seems to me, and therefore I suggest that as the sense of the Senate has been taken on the rules as they stand, no objection having been made to any of them save one, we send that resolution to the House. When the House shall concur, then they will be joint rules, as they are not now, and then I shall see no objection to the resolution of the Senator from Delaware, and then I submit to him it will take the whole effect which he wants to give it whereas now I think it premature and likely to anticipate what has always been expressed as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. My object in proposing a conference in this resolution was simply to secure consultation between the two Houses in regard to measures for their joint proceedings. I used the words perhaps unnecessarily, and they certainly seem open to the technical objection of the Senator from New York, for the objection is technical. If the committees were by joint resolution to be instructed, that very fact would signify that they had the opportunity of mutual consultation before they made the report, and the use of the word "conference" suggests to them that the rules to be reported to the respective Houses should be the same. The only object was to secure consultation. The words were put in, perhaps, unnecessarily.

But the Senate need not treat this as a matter of conference unless a committee of conference shall be found to be necessary. Every resolution that is to be acted on by the two Houses on a matter like this would seem to make a consultation between the committees necesary before they report. Otherwise there would be no use of the reports to each House. However, this resolution is to be considered by unanimous consent to-day or not at all. If objection be made from any quarter, it must go over. I was aware of that when I called it up; but at the same time after there had been examination by a committee upon a very important subject, I trusted there would be no objection. The question ought to be considered of the power of each House over the joint rules, especially in regard to matters embraced in the twenty-second joint rule which has just been excepted by the Senate. I thought no more important question could be brought to the attention of this body, and that the report of a committee of each House ought to be had upon it in order that we might know what proper action to take.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not like to interpose an objection against the resolution of the Senator from Delaware, but as he seems not to be strenuous about it at this time, I prefer that it lie over. I should like to have a concurrence of the two Houses on all these rules of which they are really agreed, to the end that we may have a completed record of these rules until we change them. We have adopted a mode of getting at them. I fear that if at the same time we send a resolution proposing a conference committee, or whatever it may be called, the force of our action may be mistaken by the House, and therefore although I do not like to interpose an objection I prefer that this resolution should lie over and be considered at what I think will be a more convenient and at all events a more wholesome time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act, a copy of the report of Major G. L. FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 141 to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, be taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Freedman's Bank.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twelve o'clock and eighteen minutes. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature.

J. EUGENE ROBERT.

Mr. HILL. The Committee on Ways and Means have had under consideration the memorial of J. Eugene Robert, of New York City, praying for relief in the case of certain imported goods stolen while in transit from the steamer Santiago de Cuba to the public stores, and have unanimously directed me to report back the memorial and move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the memorial will be laid on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I submit that it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The committee have reported adversely.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Suppose the House vote upon laying the memorial on the table, and refuse to adopt that proposition?

The SPEAKER. Of course if that question arises——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I raise the point that this proposition must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, as it contemplates an appropriation.

Mr. HILL. This is merely a memorial, not a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order that this memorial, if required, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but the Chair understands that the gentleman does not insist upon his objection.

Mr. MORRISON. I call attention to the fact that there is no bill accompanying this memorial.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is simply a memorial, which the committee report back adversely.

The memorial was laid on the table.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

Mr. WADDELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 3) to reduce postage and to move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to understand what is the character of the bill; for if it is of one character I should like to have it laid upon the table myself.

Mr. WADDELL. This is not a bill touching third-class matter. It was introduced by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES,] and provides for the reduction of postage on first-class matter to one cent for each half ounce, which the committee instructed me to report back adversely.

Mr. CONGER. To that I have no objection.

The bill was laid on the table.

JOHN B. DAVIS, OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. WADDELL, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John B. Davis, of Memphis, Tennessee, for relief, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. AINSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the following cases, and the same be referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 420) for the relief of John J. Thomas, postmaster at Hancock, in Washington County, Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 421) for the relief of C. H. Walker, postmaster at Frostburgh, in Alleghany County, Maryland;

The memorial of O. T. Letcher, postmaster at Bryan, Ohio, praying to be re-imbursed for currency and postage-stamps destroyed by fire;

A bill (H. R. No. 510) for the relief of W. C. Snyder, of Illinois; and

The petition of Mrs. Josephine E. Owen and 52 others, of Randolph, New York, praying for the relief of Josephine E. Owen, postmistress at Randolph, New York.

G. HARRIS HEAP.

Mr. HEWITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis.

The joint resolution which was read, provides that G. Harris Heap, consul of the United States at Tunis, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JAMES CLARK SMITH.

Mr. MONROE. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the petition and accompanying papers of James Clark

Smith, of Dundee, Scotland, for indemnity for loss of £104 18s. 5d. in consequence of the seizure of certain clothes at the custom-house in New York. Mr. Smith is a foreigner, which is, I suppose, the reason why the matter was referred to us. But, in the opinion of the committee, it should properly go to the Committee on Claims. I move that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the case and it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS AND BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1340) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions and bounty lands; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. JENKS also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the following cases, and the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Application for special act for the honorable discharge from the United States medical service of Benjamin Penny, late private in Company G, Forty-fourth Ohio Volunteers; and Application for special act in the case of Eldridge Weaver, late private in Company C, Seventeenth Illinois Volunteers.

CORRECTION OF ERROR OF ENROLLMENT.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 828) to correct an error of enrollment.

The bill was read. It sets forth in its preamble that in the enrollment of the act approved March 3, 1875, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, an item which passed both Houses was inadvertently omitted; and that in order that the same shall have the validity which it was intended to have by the action of Congress, it therefore authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to give John S. Chapman, late collector of internal revenue for the second district in the State of Louisiana, credit in the settlement of his accounts for the sum of $900, taxes collected, which was lost or stolen while in course of transmittal, in a registered letter, through the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I think the point of order would operate against the bill as making an appropriation.

Mr. DARRALL. I hope the gentleman will not object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withhold the point of order until the gentleman makes a statement.

Mr. DARRALL. This bill simply provides that an item in the deficiency appropriation bill, which was omitted in the hasty enrollment on the last day of the last session, should become a law. It was passed by both Houses of Congress. There is no question about that. The record will show it. It was investigated by the Committee on Enrolled Bills, of which I was chairman, in the last Congress. And this bill provides that the item inadvertently omitted shall have the validity which it was entitled to have by the action of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. From what committee does this bill come?

Mr. DARRALL. From the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman makes the report from that committee?

Mr. DARRALL. I do; after an investigation by the committee of the record of the last Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me almost impossible that an item of that sort should have been deemed germane to the sundry civil bill.

Mr. DARRALL. It was an item in the deficiency bill. The records of last Congress will show, and I can refer the gentleman to the page, that this item originated as a Senate amendment, was adopted by the House, and passed by both Houses.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose if it was a mere error of enrollment the point of order should not be insisted on.

Mr. DARRALL. It is nothing else.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I do not insist on the point of order.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER IN THE HALL.

The SPEAKER. There is still too much confusion in the Hall. The Chair is informed by one of the officers of the House that very much of this confusion is made outside of the seats of members and by gentlemen who are on the floor by the courtesy of the House. It will become the duty of the Chair, if gentlemen so enjoying the courtesy of the House do not better use it, to order the space outside to be cleared. Gentlemen outside the seats of members are requested to cease conversation or to retire to the cloak-room.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees having been completed, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOPKINS,] who rises to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Centennial appropriation bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Before that motion is put, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to suggest that before we go into Committee of the Whole it would be well to limit some time in which this debate should be concluded. I suppose there are a large number of gentlemen who wish to speak. I do not wish to cut off the general debate absolutely, but I think it would be well if the chairman of the committee would indicate some time when the hour-debate should terminate, after which we would have the five-minute discussions under the ordinary rule for discussing such bills in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am willing to submit the question of time to the judgment of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to suggest, inasmuch as it is understood that quite a large number of gentlemen desire to be heard, that even during this day and before adopting the five-minute rule a less period than one hour be accepted by unanimous consent as the time in which gentlemen shall deliver their remarks to the House. I therefore suggest that by unanimous consent it be ordered that debate to-day be confined to twenty-minute speeches.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that one of the gentlemen who has an hour to-day, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOK,] has parceled that hour out to various gentlemen. I would agree, however, that after two hours there should be a limit of twenty minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I accept that suggestion, modifying it with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania so that after two hours the speakers be limited to fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] yield to have that proposition submitted to the House?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. BANKS. I wish to inquire if that is a proper motion to come from the other side of the House, which occupied nearly the whole time yesterday with two able speeches against this bill? I must object.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOPKINS, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Centennial appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOOD, of New York, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I use the language, slightly modified, that John Adams used a hundred years ago, when he said "I am for the Declaration." I am for the Celebration. A hundred years ago we were a feeble folk, scattered over a vast extent of country, and with a population of less than three millions. A hundred years have made us a nation of more than forty millions; a nation made up of material second to no nation now on the face of the earth, and second to no nation that ever existed. If there be a nation among the dominions of the earth that has hitherto been proud of its achievements, that nation is the United States of America. We have just expended more than $5,000,000,000 to render it certain that this nation shall exist. We have spent $5,000,000,000 to have a centennial. That money is expended, and I put it to my side of the House to say whether we should grudge a million and a half of dollars to show to the nations of the earth the quality of our people and their progress in arts, agriculture, and manufactures. That is the way I feel in regard to this question. And when you come to the constitutional question, the question of right, I say, sir, that if a nation has a right to exist it has a right to show to the world that it does exist. That is the whole constitutional question that troubles me. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, we have had an appeal to us in behalf of the poor. What has this nation as a nation to do with that question? Our strict construction friends on the other side of the House tell us that that belongs to the States. I join hands with them on that subject; it belongs to the States; it does not belong here. Gentlemen on the other side of the Hall are eternally quoting the scriptures. My emaciated friend from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] who has appealed so eloquently in behalf of the poor, is a good, Christian man; I have known him a long time. And I want to call his attention to the fact that two thousand years ago a woman was wild enough to go and waste a box of ointment on the feet of a most eminent individual. One of those looking on, whose name was Iscariot, said that the ointment might have been sold for three hundred pence and the money given to the poor. [Laughter.] There is another verse which refers to this interference in behalf of the poor which I will not read. My friend may read it at his leisure.

Now, sir, I sympathize with the poor, and it is because I sympathize with the poor that I want this nation to flourish and be honored at home and abroad. The poor of this country occupy a position which the poor of no country before ours ever occupied since Adam and Eve, going on a farming expedition, emigrated from Eden. [Laughter.] I am for this appropriation for the benefit of the poor.

But I must refer to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] He is on my side on this question. In the most kindly and becoming manner he talked about the poor, as if Texas was poor. Texas poor? Good God! [Laughter.] There is not a gentleman on this floor who has not been asleep for the last fifteen years who does not know that Texas to-day has four times the material wealth that she had in 1860, and I was assured by a worthy gentleman on this floor from that State whose word I take as law that the population of the State has actually doubled since 1870.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me say to the gentleman that his information is not correct. There is now in Texas a degree of adversity and poverty rarely witnessed in the civilized world.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The gentleman has the misfortune to suppose that I am nothing but a wild Yankee; but I can assure that gentleman that a large family, dear to me, nursed in my very bosom, are not only residents of Texas, but were there before the revolution from Mexico, and that their large landed propety has more than quadrupled in value since 1860. I understand all about the present condition of Texas. I am a breeder of cattle in Iowa for the market, and when I go West to look after my flocks I find the Texas cattle which were rendered numerous by the events of the war now sent to feed and fatten in the parks of Colorado, on the plains of Laramie, and on the prairies of Kansas and Nebraska; and when I go there, the broad horns of those cattle are shaken in my face as a good strict constructionist sometimes shakes his head across this floor at us poor unhappy republicans. [Laughter.] And when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] shook his clenched hand at me I felt as I do when I meet a Texas steer.

The gentleman [Mr. REAGAN] wants to show how Texas is suffering. Sir, Texas has sent us one representative, apparently for the very purpose of showing her famished condition. She could not have shown her suffering condition better by sending a sack of three hundred and fifty pounds of sweet cream, and the Speaker has never done a more graceful or proper act than he did when he made that gentleman chairman of the committee on the sufferings of Texas. [Laughter.] And now I am going further in this thing of talking about suffering. I know our southern friends are suffering awfully. They suffer as our northern financiers suffer. The suffering of the democracy of Pennsylvania and Ohio is for more money. The financiers of the cities are suffering from too much money. [Laughter.] But through our broad country, except in some branches of manufactures, there is very little suffering as compared with the catastrophies of other days.

And, sir, the cotton States are no exception to the general condition of the country. Sir, the production of cotton last year was within one-fifteenth of the largest in the history of our country. The largest production was in 1860, when God was good to us all and gave to the South its largest crop of cotton and to the nation Father Abraham. [Laughter.] If we can rely upon the reports of the production of cotton, this year the production will be equal to the best year in the history of the Republic. But that is not all. The production of breadstuffs in the cotton States is so much greater than it formerly was that I may safely say that last year the cotton States raised more what is for the comfort of man than ever before. I acknowledge that it was not divided as it used to be before the last war. When we started with this Republic we disregarded God's law, which He laid down for His own people, the children of Israel, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." We left the muzzle on. But during the war the muzzle has dropped from the ox and never can be put on again. Now, in the division of the products of the cotton States the ox, that is, he that does the work, shares a little in the proceeds.

And let me say to our strict-constructionist friends on the other side that, if it should be the case in the cotton States that there is more attention paid to the Constitution than there is to the fields of cotton growing there and to the working people, there will be a mighty danger that these fellows who till the soil will become possessed of the soil itself and the defenders of the Constitution will grow poorer and poorer.

I have said this much about the alleged poverty of the country. I claim that the agricultural interests in the United States since 1872 have prospered equally with those of any other three years in the history of the Government. I say it because I am a farmer myself, as well as a lawyer, and share in the proceeds of farms and in the suffering upon the farm, whatever that is. My constituents suffered some last year, and from what cause? My constituents who are farmers raised potatoes, and the difficulty with them was the abundance of God's blessing. He poured it out to us—in potatoes, [laughter,] in heaping measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over, and consequently the price was low; otherwise there was no suffering with us. But those potatoes make an excellent substitute for food, and we do not starve. [Great laughter.]

Now I want to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] who talked to us so long yesterday and so eloquently about the Constitution. He seemed rather to sneer at my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who could not understand the quidaities of a strict constructionist's opinions of the Constitution. Now I acknowledge myself in the same category with the gentleman from Maine. As a lawyer, I should have confidence enough in myself to think that I could sit down and come to some sort of a conclusion about the Constitution, as to what you might do under it and what you might not. But in the school of strict construction God only knows—and it is only because I believe in God's omniscience that I can believe "that God knows"—what a "strict construction" of the Constitution would be. [Laughter.]

I must not say, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. WOOD, of New York,] that you and I have seen this out for a great while, for you are a young man compared with myself. [Laughter.] But I have seen this thing out certainly since 1830. The great apostle of strict construction, Mr. Calhoun, from 1816 to 1824 believed that the only true method of supporting this Government was by duties on importations. It happened that New England run all the ships, while his part of the country did not run any. By and by it happened to be the fact that these unconstitutional Yankees took advantage of the state of things which the strict constructionists from South Carolina had created, and they went to manufacturing. By 1824 our great apostle of strict construction had his doubts, and by 1830 he discovered that this method of raising means of supporting the Government by duties on importations was altogether unconstitutional. He could not find anything about it in Madison's writing, and I presume he had the same manual the gentlemen from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] read from yesterday. He was in as much trouble as a distinguished gentleman here a few years ago was about the proposition to pave Pennsylvania avenue. He declared that he could not find the name of Pennsylvania avenue in the whole Constitution from beginning to end. [Great laughter.] In 1830 Mr. Calhoun and South Carolina, his home, (it was a different South Carolina from what it is to-day and represented differently,) resolved to nullify the acts of Congress. Mr. Chairman, we, above all others, remember who was President then; it was not James Buchanan; it was Andrew Jackson. And he said, "By the eternal, I will hang every South Carolinian who undertakes to nullify the acts of Congress higher than Haman." Mr. Calhoun did not give up his opinions but he gave up the fight, as I think a certain other fight would have been given up had Andrew Jackson been in the presidential chair instead of James Buchanan.

From 1830 to 1860 we had it off and on, in season and out of season, and without any season and without cessation, arguing that we were not a nation, arguing that we had no power to live. But even during that time the great strict constructionist, Mr. Calhoun, had this question presented to him: "Shall this great nation suffer the people of Ireland to starve in their famine or shall the nation from its abundance send them food?" The great father of strict construction voted for that proposition. And I commend to the future studies and reflection of the gentleman from Virginia, who addressed us so eloquently yesterday, [Mr. TUCKER,] that vote of Mr. Calhoun. I am bound to mention incidentally that it would help the democratic party to conciliate the Irish vote. [Laughter.] I do not think that influenced his vote; no, he was above it, away up in the cerulean regions of the Constitution. [Great laughter.]

Again it happened that a Yankee adventurer up in the polar regions of the icy north found the Resolute, a ship which had belonged to the squadron of Sir John Franklin, and Mr. Mason, of Virginia, a great strict constructionist—and I believe it was the same one that went to Europe with Slidell to help the confederate cause—believed that it was his duty and privilege to move in the Senate to appropriate $40,000 to fit up that ship and send it home to England. That was all under strict construction.

I said I could not understand this constitutional question. I do not want my friends on the other side who participated in the "late unpleasantness" to suppose that in what I am going to say I intend to say anything unkind, for I am not; I only want to talk this matter over a little, and I do not want any gentleman to shake his head at me, because that scares me. I am simply trying to find what this constitutional question means.

About 1860 and 1861 it was held by some gentlemen that under the Constitution a man owed his first allegiance to his State, holding that we were a confederacy of States; and as one State after another went out officers of the Army and officers of the Navy "followed their State," because they thought they held they might under the constitution of their own State and in virtue of their rights under the Constitution of the United States. One gentleman after another left this Hall because he thought it was his duty to "follow his State" under the Constitution. They went out and fought gallantly against our people. I say not a word in disparagement of them. I stand here to give the right hand of fellowship to any man who loves our political Zion and glories in the stones thereof, whatever may have been his past antecedents.

Robert E. Lee, whose body it seems rests in the district and in the town of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] held an office in the United States Army. He resigned that position, and did so under a belief that it was his constitutional duty to "follow his State." Well, the fight began. But it was found as soon as the fight did begin that Harry Gilmore of Maryland, Blanton Duncan of Kentucky, John C. Breckinridge of Kentucky, and Humphrey Marshall of Kentucky, all felt themselves just as strongly bound to follow "the Constitution" and fight against their own States, neither of which ever went out of the Union, as Lee and the gentlemen above mentioned did to fight for theirs! Now, how can I, a poor unsophisticated Yankee, living up where the air is less pure, less cerulean, understand what the gentlemen mean by constitutional scruples! They must go out because their State goes out; and they must go out and fight because their State does not go out!

Mr. WILLIS. May I ask my colleague whether he concedes that there is no power in the Constitution to make the appropriation here asked for?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. All I have to say is that I have here a record that on a certain occasion when a man undertook to look after the poor, [holding up the New Testament,] it was said that he did not care for them. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. I will ask the honorable gentleman——

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I have not time to go into that question. I want my friend to get over his leanness, and "laugh and grow fat." [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he finds his rule of construction in the book he holds in his hand or in the decisions of the Supreme Court?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am not bothering my head with that. I am going on with my talk. I came here to have it. [Laughter.]

But I have another constitutional difficulty, and I want particularly to commend it to the strict constructionists of the other side. In the progress of the war that we had in this "unpleasantness" the Government of this country, administered by "black republicans"—fellows that have heads shaken at them as the gentleman from Georgia shook his head at us the other day—found it necessary to issue greenbacks. Now I undertake to say that the tears that have been shed over the unconstitutionality of the greenbacks on the democratic side during the war, before the "unpleasantness" ended, and which have been shed by those who were against us since their return, would fill, if collected, not a lachrymatory such as they used to put in tombs in the olden times, but would fill the biggest demijohn that a democratic constituency ever emptied. [Laughter.] Their mourning was like the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.

True, the Supreme Court by a majority decided that Congress did not act unconstitutionally in issuing greenbacks under the exigency of the case. But, my friends, I am an old Jackson democrat; a Jeffersonian democrat; and, but for that slavery question, I should be a democrat to-day. The difficulty with me was that I followed Jefferson; I read what Jefferson said in his Notes on Virginia; and, thank God, I believed it; and any country that would prosper must believe it. We held, and Jackson held, that the decision of the Supreme Court could not bind the conscience of a member of Congress; and therefore members of Congress are not bound on this question when new legislation shall arise.

Now time ran on. The men who issued the greenback intended that at some day not far distant we should return to the old Bentonian and Jacksonian currency: hard money. That is what those who put out the greenback generally understand, though some do not. Now here in this House the other day I was mightily instructed to see the vote on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] A few gentlemen from the Northern States voted with him; but pretty much the entire confederate phalanx, the whole body of Constitution-loving strict constructionists marched up as one man to the inevitable "deadly breach" and voted for greenbacks. Now, I say that, in view of these things, I cannot understand what a man means by strict construction of the Constitution. Good God, who can understand it? [Laughter.]

I will tell you what from all this I understand a strict construction of the Constitution to be. I understand that, if a strict constructionist wants a measure to succeed, it is constitutional; and, if he does not want it, it is unconstitutional. [Great laughter.] I understand, sir, that the legal position was perfectly expressed by an Irishman in my district. He bought a horse, and when a man owns property he thinks it is the best thing in the world. He led out his horse and showed it to his neighbors. One neighbor, wishing to worry him, asked him whether his horse had the glanders. "What is it you call the glanders?" asked the Irishman. "It is not for me to tell you, but I want to know whether your horse has the glanders?" "Well," said he, "if he is better for the glanders he has the glanders enough, but if he is the worse for the glanders he has not the glanders at all." [Great laughter.] Now, the gentleman from Virginia must pardon me, but I think this question has not got the glanders at all. [Renewed laughter.]

But, sir, I stand here as a representative of the people of this country, however unworthily, and I am bound to take notice of another thing which dropped from that gentleman. That gentleman put forward the proposition, in substance, that this people are not a nation, that we were a confederacy of States. True, his more experienced northern democratic neighbor from Indiana begged of him not to open that question. Still it was put forward here. Now, sir, from 1790 and earlier, up to 1860, that question was debated in every assembly, in every meeting of Congress, upon the hustings, and in State Legislatures. It was argued as a man would argue with his brother, sometimes fiercely, sometimes in good temper, sometimes calmly, and sometimes in bad temper. In 1860 a constitutional majority of the country, in the way the vote was cast by the people, elected Abraham Lincoln and a Congress that held with Lincoln that this was a nation. An appeal was then taken from this decision of the people to the arbitrament of war, and from 1861 to 1865 brave men on both sides, noble-spirited men—Americans—met in the terrible arbitrament of steel to settle upon the battle-field whether we were a nation or not. This was the question brought up in this court of appeal. I see the gentleman from Virginia is a lawyer; I am a lawyer; and we understand how questions of appeal are disposed of. It was argued on one side with apparent success on one field, and with apparent success upon the other side upon another field, from Gettysburgh to New Orleans, from the ocean to the Sabine, from Belmont to the Gulf, and final judgment was rendered on the appeal in the gentleman's own district at Appomattox Court-House. Final judgment upon that appeal was rendered and recorded then, and I wish the gentleman from Virginia had gone to Appomattox Court-House and read up the record before he came here with a view to open that discussion again and throw this country into a new turmoil.

Does anybody think we are not a nation? Is this any less your nation, my Virginia friend, than mine? Have I any more glory in this nation than you have? If you are to prosper, are you not to prosper through this nation? If you are to go abroad, do you not go with the passport of this nation? If you are to blush in Europe for your country, is it not for this country? And if you are to be proud in Europe, and step two inches higher than any other man, do you not do it by virtue of the fact that this is your country? [Laughter.] Let alone the great "unpleasantness;" that is over. If we are honest men, kindly men, that is all over.

I tell you, gentlemen, that this is your nation and my nation. We are all one. I do not know how it will be up at Philadelphia, but I will talk about that by and by. Here it is our country, and our capital. My district is part of your country, and your district, my friend, whether you feel good-natured or ill-natured, is part of my country. It is so under the Constitution.

Now, sir, I have said thus much, let me say further. Shall we be honored; shall we be respected? Is England going to get any advantage of us? Are you going to have John Bull shake his head at you and say things are done a great deal better at "'ome?" What did we have this fight on our side for? I am willing to refer it to the other side. It was that we should be a great country, big enough to meet all the world, and to fight all the world if necessary. We wanted you side by side with us—just the men who are here, for we knew you were brave before the war, but you did not know we were, and there was never a more disappointed people in the world than you were. [Laughter.] I will confess here before you that the miserable creatures we sent to Congress, who always yielded everything when you clamored, cheated you into that struggle. [Great laughter.] You found that we are as brave as you are yourselves, and we and you always respect a man who has the courage of his opinion, while we despise a sneak.

Now, having gone so far, I stand here to make a confession. I am bound to do it. The other day I heard that dreadful cry come up from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] I heard his indictment read against us. And I am sorry to say that although most of the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] was honorable, high-toned, and magnanimous, there were a few words which I did not like, and which grated on my ears. Centennial and amnesty have been made to run together. I am not going to say much about amnesty. I am going to make confession. The gentleman from Georgia arraigned us republicans and told us, with his closed hand shaking at us, that we, a whole hundred men of us, had violated every oath and had committed every crime. Now, I am going to confess that we have been guilty of several things. And, first, I confess that we sat here when he was gone and tried to save this country so that there should be a centennial. We were "fanatical" about it. We were "mad." We were "crazy." And our fanaticism did not stop on this side of the House. On the other side of the House, if I am correctly informed, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] so far partook of the fanaticism as to buckle on his knapsack in this fanatical cause; and many another brave man now voting on the other side was led, beguiled, cheated, into joining us in our "fanaticism." We fought the fight out "wickedly," "madly," "maliciously," and we say we are guilty of it. We have to own it before God and man.

But, Mr. Chairman, it was the fanaticism of those men over there and here and their associates which saved this country. But for that we should have been in a beautiful condition now, split in two in the middle, and God knows in what condition the inside would have appeared. [Laughter.] But, secondly, I am bound to make further confession to the gentleman from Georgia. We were guilty when we had two-thirds of both Houses of Congress of doing away, by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses, all the disabilities of every member on this floor who participated in the confederacy. Being "madly," "wickedly," maliciously determined to injure these men and not let our hatred die out, we let them in here—these men, the sixty-one fine-looking gentlemen who walked up here together the other day, unable to take the full oath. We were guilty of letting them all back here and of not saying and of never having said an unkind word of them or to them since they returned. We do not think quite kindly of Jefferson Davis, but he is not here. This kindness to our sixty-one associates is a piece of wickedness which I know should not be forgiven in this world or the next. I know it is unchristian.

Why right here sits the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] although he is not in his place just now. He made a beautiful speech here the other day. But, Mr. Chairman, what long days of summer have I passed in the old church in Troy, listening to line upon line, and precept upon precept, from that gentleman telling me that there could not and there should not be any pardon except upon confession and repentance. I know we have not lived up to that doctrine. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] quoted scripture here on one of the first days of the session, and again we had the scripture brought in here yesterday afternoon—the Old Testament both times. They went back to the old dispensation; to Greece and Rome and the Old Testament; and Elijah, and the Lord knows what. I was taught to read that book in my boyhood, and saw then the terrible things narrated in the Old Testament. I remember that the people of God when in the wilderness murmured against him, and that he announced the decree that, of all who came out of Egypt and murmured against Him, from twenty years old and upward, no man should ever enter the promised land but Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua, the son of Nun. And it did occur to me the other day when gentlemen were quoting scripture that it would not have been injurious to the gentleman from Georgia if he had been left a little longer in the wilderness. [Great laughter.] But we let them come out of it, I own and confess it before God and man and the other side of the House and the country.

Nor is that all the wickedness we have committed. We have done more. What have we done to a portion of these men of the South who went to Brazil after the surrender at Appomattox? Those men said "this is not our country; we won't live in it; we will go to Brazil, where in its jungles we can enjoy the benefits of the 'unbroken constitution' and the 'principles of '98.'" They went there, and they had just as good a time of it as their friends have had here during the unpleasantness—only for a little longer period. And now this miserable republican party and republican administration have violated the Constitution by sending "maliciously and fanatically" a ship of war to Brazil to bring these fellows home at the expense of the Government. [Laughter.] And when I confess these things I do not much wonder at the feeling of horror and detestation that seemed to fill the bosom of the gentleman from Georgia the other day. It is almost too much for poor human nature to bear, but I hope he will live through it.

There is another confession I want to make here. The dropping off of the muzzle of the ox that treadeth out the corn, the dropping off of the muzzle from the working population at the South has rendered it possible for seven colored men to occupy places on this floor. They represent just about a million of the forty millions of the people of the United States. Now I am bound to say that these men during the time I have sat here have come into this Hall well dressed; they assume the carriage of gentlemen; they insult no man; they encroach upon no man; and in the few instances when they have arisen to address the House, it has been done with an intelligence, a deference, and consideration that might do credit to any statesman in any land. But I acknowledge for them, in response to the jests thrown out against them by the member from New York [Mr. COX] the other day, that their faces are not quite so light as the brilliant Saxon color of the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.] They are guilty of that, and I hope they will not be punished for it. I hope that gentlemen on the other side of the House will treat with deference these colored men just struggling into political existence, standing here, as they do, as the representatives, not merely of their direct constituencies, but of four million people their kindred. I hope that no gentleman will again, while I have a seat upon this floor, pain me by alluding to the fact that they are colored men. [Applause.]

Now, sir, I have gone over this matter and I want to make another point in reference to it. I want to beg the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] that if in future discussions he finds me so wicked, to spare me. I am young and timid. [Laughter.] And when a gentleman in the zeal of his advocacy tells me what has never been told me before, that I "have violated every oath and been guilty of every crime," and advances a half step toward me shaking at me his closed hand, it frightens me. And in the evening and in the night I do not see the lovely countenance of the gentleman from Georgia, but I dream of Preston Brooks and that terrible bludgeon that he used to carry about the Halls of the Capitol. I hope that in future the gentleman will confine himself to debate and not to threats, and not to go to war for the next half century whatever else he may do. [Laughter.]

Mr. STENGER. Mr. Chairman, I should not have troubled the House or this committee at so early a period in my congressional service were it not for the fact that I am a member of the Pennsylvania delegation. Voting, as I shall vote, against this bill, I desire that my reasons shall be given for so doing. I have listened, sir, with great pleasure, and delight even, to the witty speech of the honorable gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] And I have done so particularly for the reason that it is in such striking contrast with the little speech that was made by my colleague from the fourth district of Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] on yesterday. For it will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that, while the House was in a very amiable and pleasant mood under this discussion, the lugubrious tone of my colleague fell upon our ears as he read the burial service at the interment of my colleague from the twenty-third district, [Mr. COCHRANE.]

I read from the remarks of the honorable gentleman:

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the well-rounded periods of my youthful colleague, and remembered that he did not utter the sentiments of one-tenth of one per cent. of his constituents, I could not help thinking of the disagreeable habit imposed upon the Trappist monks of digging their own grave the day they enter the order and making it a part of their daily duty to see that it is in good condition. I do not know through what association of ideas it was, but that fact was present with me through the whole of his remarks.

I listened to him as though he were an oracle. I paid strict attention to him because I felt that if there was any man on this floor who was competent to speak by authority and experience on this subject of grave-digging it was my colleague from the fourth district, because, if half the reports which come to me from Pennsylvania be true, he for the last year and more has been engaged in the business of preparing his own sepulcher. [Laughter.] But, sir, I was not so uncharitable and I am not so uncharitable to-day as to hope or believe that as to him shall be applied the remark of the clown in Hamlet, who, speaking of the grave-digger, said, "the houses that he makes last till doomsday." But, sir, when my colleague went a little further and proposed to take care of the remains of my other colleague, I felt that he was undertaking an utterly impossible task. I know very well his great energy, I know his great ability, and I respect him for both; but, sir, if it be true that he has dug his own political grave, is it not a strange thing for him to attempt to take care of the remains of my colleague? For will he not then be playing the double rôle of the corpse and the sexton at once?

Now, Mr. Chairman, stripped of all the tinsel trappings with which the friends of this bill have adorned it; setting aside for a moment the sneers which have been thrown across this Chamber against gentlemen who doubt the constitutionality of this bill, let me state what is the naked proposition contained in it. Why, sir, it is that the Congress of the United States shall appropriate a million and a half of dollars to a body-corporate with no liability on the part of the Federal Government whatever for any debts or expenses which that corporation may contract, and with a right to share pro rata in the assets of that corporation. More than that, sir, it is a demand on the part of the friends of this bill that the Congress of the United States shall thus take stock in what they confess to be an insolvent corporation.

Now there is no doubt about this being a corporation. I have used the very words of the bill, which provide that this shall be constituted "a body-corporate." Afterward in one of the sections, I think in the act creating this centennial board of finance, it is spoken of as "a corporation." Now, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] to whose address I listened with very great pleasure the other day, and who gave us a vast fund of information of which I was certainly entirely ignorant before, but which I now know was true and correct—the gentleman from New York says that this is not a corporation in any fair sense of the term. Why not? What feature does it lack? I admit, as the gentleman insists, that it is a corporation framed and authorized for a public purpose. I admit all that. But there is a clause in section 10 of the act approved June, 1872, which provides—

That as soon as practicable after the payment of its liabilities to divide its remaining assets among the stockholders pro rata in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock.

That is, they are to realize the revenues which flow into this exposition, and if there be not enough to cancel the par value of the capital stock, they are to be the losers; if there be more, if the assets of this corporation when they come to wind up will more than pay the debts and the capital stock, then they are to have that excess divided among them.

Now it is no answer to that to say to me at this late day that there is no prospect of there being any additional revenue over and above the liabilities and the stock. We must look at this act of Congress as it was at the time it was framed and to the ideas which gentlemen then entertained as to what this exposition would yield. I submit that from the very fact that these gentlemen came here and took their charter from the United States Government upon the condition that the United States Government should not be liable for a dollar of expense or debt, they had the idea that this institution or this corporation would be a paying corporation.

I have said that I shall vote against this bill. I do not intend to weary the House with a protracted argument upon the constitutionality of this question. Not that I care at all for the sneers which come from the other side of the House—not at all. But I think the ground has been well covered by the gentlemen who have preceded me in their able addresses to this House. There is one fact, in addition to what they have said, which clinches the matter in my mind; that is this: the very discussion this bill has given rise to upon this question of constitutional power on this floor, the very fact that over in the other Chamber the best minds of that branch of Congress have been engaged in the discussion of this question, and there has been a clash of able intellects upon it, satisfies me that I ought not to vote for this bill. If there is anything clear in that Constitution it is this, that the powers that are not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. And to doubt the exercise of a constitutional power is with me to decide the question.

I desire, however, while I am on that point, simply to call the attention of the House to a remark made by my colleague, the chairman of the Centennial Committee, [Mr. HOPKINS.] He said:

I will not weary the House by quoting any lengthy extracts, but will refer simply to the fact that Washington in his first annual message said:

"I cannot forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home."

He cited that as evidence of the fact that we have the constitutional power to pass this bill. Why, sir, the recommendation of President Washington is covered by one of the enumerated powers of the Constitution; there is no doubt about that whatever. At the close of section 8, article 1 of the Constitution, enumerating the powers of Congress, we read this: "To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for a limited time to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." The gentleman need not strain the Constitution to find the authority for the recommendation of President Washington in that message, because it is among the enumerated powers. I maintain that, unless there is an express grant of power to Congress in the Constitution or a clear implication flowing from an express grant, there is no shadow of authority to pass such a bill as this. So, believing in its unconstitutionality, I shall vote against the bill.

I am not unmindful of the considerations which have been urged upon this floor in favor of this bill. I am not unmindful of the fact that it appeals to the patriotism of this House. I have listened with great pleasure to the eloquent appeals which have been made by gentlemen to that sentiment. While I claim to be as good a patriot as any man on this floor, while I love my country, while I love her rivers, her lakes, her mountains, her valleys, her prairies, I love her Constitution and her institutions more.

I am not unmindful either that we are told that this is to be the centennial year; that this is to usher in the era of peace and good-will in this land. I ardently and devoutly trust in God that that may be true. I represent a district lying along the southern border of the State of Pennsylvania, a district that was exposed to the raids, and ravages, and incursions, and invasions of the enemy. I have seen the property of my people taken away by the enemy. I was an eye-witness of the indescribable horrors of that terrible July day when Chambersburgh went down in flames. I saw her people driven early in the morning from their burning homes, saving nothing scarcely of their earthly possessions but the clothing which covered their nakedness. Yet I voted with the utmost cheerfulness the other day for general and unqualified amnesty. I did it because I believed that my people cherished no vindictive or retributive feelings toward the people of the South. I believed that they, in common with the vast majority of the people of this country, are anxious that the era of peace and good-will shall be ushered in; are anxious that this century, which has seen the shackles stricken from every slave, should be crowned with the glory of the removal of all political disabilities from every citizen of the United States.

Nor am I unmindful of the fact that it is said the national honor is involved in this question. We are asked to pass this bill because it is said we shall violate the national honor if we do not pass it; and this cry comes with special weakness, it seems to me, from the other side of this Chamber. Why, sir, on three several occasions the Congress of the United States, in which there was a majority of republican gentlemen, have deliberately declared to this centennial board of finance that not a dollar should be given by Congress to defray the expenses of this exposition. They did it in the act creating the centennial commission; they did it in the act creating the centennial board of finance; they did it in the very act in which they authorized the President of the United States to invite foreign nations here. Yet, notwithstanding those declarations, put upon paper for the whole American people and for the whole world to read, they come here and say to us that we shall violate the national honor if we do not pass this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the national honor can best be preserved by following the letter of the Constitution. I know of nothing which authorizes the violation of that Constitution. And when my colleague from the fourth district [Mr. KELLEY] yesterday threw his sneer over to this side of the Chamber against my colleague from the twenty-third district [Mr. COCHRANE] because of his constitutional scruples, I was led (the association of ideas, as the gentleman has said, is a strange thing)—I was led to this thought: around me sit a large number of new members—a larger proportion of raw material, as the newspapers say, than has existed in this legislative body for a long period in our history; and as I heard my colleague sneer at constitutional scruples, I thought that possibly it might be that the "tidal wave" of which some gentleman spoke the other day, which brought in all these new members, this raw material, had received its force and strength and volume from the fact that the people were tired of these men who sneer at constitutional scruples; that they had come to the conclusion that they did not want any longer in the public service men who have such withered, dried up, or cauterized consciences that they cannot see the force of a constitutional objection which protects the public Treasury.

I am not unmindful of the fact that it has been said that this will put a very small burden upon every citizen of the land. Why, Mr. Chairman, we are the representatives of the American people; we sit here to do their bidding under our own ideas as to the Constitution of the United States. What demand has been made by the people for this appropriation? Why, sir, the centennial board of finance sent out their invitations all over this land to the people to subscribe for their stock. What was the reply that came back?

Mr. Chairman, in the very carefully prepared address delivered by Mr. Bullitt at the centennial banquet, he gave a statement of the stock subscriptions that had been made; but I am sorry to say that I cannot find in it the number of stockholders. The total stock subscriptions are $2,357,750. The stock is subscribed for at $10 per share. Out of all the 40,000,000 people in this Union, not more than 237,000 of them can have subscribed to it. Of course the number is not so large; because many private citizens and many corporations that have subscribed to that stock have taken more than a single share, which would reduce the number of stockholders very materially. More than that, a quota was assigned to each State of the Union. What was the response which came up from the States? Why, sir, I find that outside of Pennsylvania four States have subscribed: New Jersey, $100,000; Delaware, $10,000; Connecticut, $10,000; New Hampshire, $10,000; and the city of Wilmington, Delaware, $5,000 more, making a total of $135,000 subscribed by the States of this Union to the centennial board of finance.

Now we are asked to pass this bill, although Congress, sitting here from 1871 down, said, "We will not give a dollar to this." We are asked to pass it, although the people of the Union have said by their refusal to subscribe to it that they are not able to subscribe; we are asked to put on their shoulders the burden which they have refused to take upon themselves. We are asked to do it though the States have refused to give more than the pitiful sum of $135,000.

Gentlemen may say that the amount is small; but, sir, the aggregate amount is large for this nation. We are to-day staggering under a heavy load of debt, amounting to $2,200,000,000; but, notwithstanding that fact, we are asked to add $1,500,000 more, after the States and people have refused to do it. We are asked to pass it by our votes, and to impose upon the State of Pennsylvania, which in the liberality and generosity of her citizens has given $4,700,000, the duty of paying $150,000 more; for she will have to pay one-tenth of the whole. She has done far more than should have been required of her already, and I am unwilling that her people, suffering as they now are from the hardness of the times, shall be taxed any further on account of this exposition, which the other States of the Union should have made a success long ago.

Now, sir, let me read a few words (and I shall not detain the committee much longer) from Washington's Farewell Address to his countrymen:

> As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible; avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which inevitable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate.

Sir, in the line of that advice, following in the footsteps of the Father of his Country, leaning upon that address for my justification in this business, I refuse by my vote to impose upon the people of these United States any additional burden for this centennial exhibition.

I now yield whatever time I have remaining to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FELTON.]

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, I have but a few minutes to speak on this subject, and I desire first to say as a southern man I am opposed to this bill, but I am influenced by no vote this House has given upon the question of amnesty. If this House has seen proper to perpetuate a wrong, that is no reason why I should vote against my convictions. My opposition to this bill is not opposition to the centennial exhibition; for that exhibition I wish success. I trust it will be the means of sending to the ends of the earth the story of American genius and the triumphs of American industry. More particularly, I desire it may be the means of fraternizing the too-long estranged sections of our common country. But when Europe and all the world assemble in Philadelphia, I want them to learn lessons which will be valuable in all after life.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on yesterday stated that we had challenged the world to come and compete with us in our material industries. That is right. When they come, if they learn that we make the best mower and reaper, that we manufacture the best sewing-machine, that we turn out the best plow, that we can exhibit the best specimens of manufactured iron, that we have the richest and most inexhaustible resources in the world, mineral, agricultural, and commercial—when they learn all this, as they will, they will learn that which is valuable to themselves and to us.

But, sir, as they study and profit by these lessons, I want them to learn another great truth, namely, that here is the best government the world ever saw. When Europe, Japan, and China, and other nations gather next summer in the birthplace of American freedom, we must teach them this lesson. I think it is one of the grand missions of the centennial year to teach this grand lesson to all European and Asiatic monarchies and despotisms. They have been reared up to believe that it is impossible to carry on any valuable enterprise without the intervention of the government. They have been instructed, sir, that the government must furnish the money for every interest in which the nation is concerned, or which is of interest to its people. In old Rome if a gladiatorial show was demanded as a Roman holiday, the government arranged the programme and footed the bills. In Spain if a bull-fight is required for Spanish recreation, the government is the principal stockholder in the enterprise. The result of all this is the exaltation of the government and the political degradation of the people. Now, when they come to Philadelphia to attend this international exhibition, this centennial report of political freedom, let them learn that here government is dwarfed, and the people "are all in all;" that the intelligence, the wealth, the industries, and all the material and intellectual glory of the nation is deposited with the people.

In my judgment, if you pass this bill, if you associate the Government pecuniarily with this enterprise, making it the principal stockholder, you will sacrifice the only distinctive badge which gives it prominence and significance as the centennial exhibition of a republican Government. You subordinate the people and their individual wealth to the wealth and power of the Federal Government. You exhibit to all Europe tendencies to the same centralism under which they have been trained and by which they have been crushed.

I am opposed to this appropriation because it is in direct conflict with the previous action of this House. One of the first acts of this House was to pass a resolution declaring it unwise, in the present financial condition of the country, to vote any appropriations of money or lands or bonds in aid of any private enterprise. Was that vote mere child's play? Was it intended as a pleasant fraud upon the tax-payers of the country? Or was it given with a mental reservation in favor of this measure or has the financial condition of the country so far improved since that time as to authorize a liberal departure from its provisions? We gave that vote in good faith, and the country received it as a most auspicious opening of the Forty-fourth Congress. That vote was a contract between the Representatives in this House and their constituents, ratified by universal approval. Shall we break that contract to-day? If violated in one part, it is violated in all its parts, and you open the doors of this House to every scheme which seeks partnership with the nationl Treasury.

This is a private enterprise, managed and controlled by private corporators, in the interest of individual stockholders and in my judgment we have no constitutional right to vote the public funds for such a purpose. I am no lawyer, but the gentlemn from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRANE] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] yesterday absolutely exhausted the argument demonstrating the unconstitutionality of the bill.

I was amazed, sir, and interested by the line taken by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] That gentleman seemed to sneer at allusions made to the Constitution. It was to him a matter of amusement that there should be reference to that sacred instrument of the Government. He asserted that it was a cover under which every defeated party was in the habit of taking shelter. I know, sir, that it has been the custom in this House to sneer at the Constitution as something obsolete. But, sir, let me tell the gentleman that, while it has lain there lifeless, bleached like the dry bones of Ezekiel, the people of this country have once more breathed upon those bones, and it will not be long, sir, until you see bone coming to bone, until you see sinew and flesh and skin, and the principles of that old Constitution shall stand up a living army, to do battle once more for human freedom. [Applause.]

This money is not intended to develop any of the resources of the country; is not intended for protection or for relief. The financial stringency now felt throughout the country is unparalleled in its history. The pressure upon labor and all of our industries is intolerable. Manufacturing establishments are suspended; merchants are failing; agriculture is unprofitable; and general bankruptcy threatens the land. In the midst of this universal distress you are asked to vote a million and a half of the tax-payer's money for a mere exhibition.

But we are told the character of the nation is involved, and that the glory of the Republic is to be measured by the success of this international exposition. Sir, I trust we are too well established to be affected by such cheap displays of our wealth or such pompous publications of our "stock in trade." The glory of this nation consists in the freedom of the people, in its adherence to constitutional principles, and in the intelligence, morality, and material prosperity of its citizens.

Mr. COOK, obtained the floor, and yielded ten minutes of his time to Mr. JONES, of Kentucky.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. COOK. Mr. Chairman, I shall not enter into any extended discussion of the constitutionality of this question, nor shall I undertake to follow any of the gentlemen on the other side of the House who have seen proper to spread themselves over such a large extent of territory, unless it be to reply to some statements and charges which they have made. With me, sir, this is a simple question of duty, and the obligation I owe to my country especially and to my immediate constituents. That is the only pathway, the only light, I shall seek to follow. The Constitution of this country limits the power of this Government for taxation, and unless the power can be found directly given for that purpose it cannot be derived by any forced construction of that instrument. We have no authority to pass this bill. Judge Cooley, a very able man, in his work on Constitutional Limitation—and I must say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] that the Constitution was not an enigma to him, for he had studied and understood it—laid down this principle, that whenever the power to tax the people is doubtful, the doubt should be in favor of the tax-payers as against the tax-gatherers of the country. The soundness of that principle must commend itself to the intelligence of members of this House. What, sir, is the great object of government but to protect the citizen in his private property as well as in his personal liberties? It should be confined absolutely and exclusively to those two great purposes.

The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] seemed to regard the Constitution, as he said himself, as an enigma. He had studied it as a riddle; he felt no more bound by it than he would be bound by a rope of sand which would be swept away by every wave of passion, or worse, a rubber band, which could be stretched to cover every outrage which they might seek to perpetrate upon the people. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] seems to have equally as vague, uncertain, and indefinite ideas of it and his obligations to it. The great difficulty which gentlemen from New England have labored under always in regard to the Constitution of their country has been the reason why one of her most distinguished Senators doubted the divine authority of the Bible—he was not the author of it. The reason why these gentlemen do not regard their obligations to the Constitution is that they did not write it. Perhaps the only article of the Constitution which gentlemen from New England insisted on or had incorporated in it was that which extended the slave-trade for twenty years when the South was protesting against it. My own State, while a colony, prohibited slavery for forty years, while every ship that sailed from Boston was freighted with rum and other goods to bring back slaves; and the people of the colony of Georgia protested against its introduction, but Great Britain finally inflicted the plague upon us. We know how principles and men have changed since. When the twenty years had expired, when you had filled your coffers from this inhuman traffic, then you turned upon us and brought this wreck and ruin upon the country. I do not propose to reply to the harsh language. I will not characterize it in any stronger terms than that with which we have been assailed from day to day and from year to year since I have been a member of this House. I have treated it with silent contempt.

Mr. Chairman, I would not have sought this opportunity to address the House, but gentlemen who have been arguing this bill have suggested that my position and that my vote against it would be construed as a feeling and sentiment against a great and glorious development of patriotism which this exhibition is to produce, and that because of the defeat of the amnesty bill. Now, sir, I voted against the proposition two years ago in this House. My vote stands recorded on the Journal of the House against this appropriation, and that immediately after gentlemen on the other side of the House had, with the most remarkable unanimity, passed an amnesty bill which relieved every man in the land. The only thing that has ever induced me to question the correctness of my vote on that occasion was that I found myself voting with the republican party, or at least with a large and distinguished portion of them. And I say that my loyalty to the Government, my fealty to the obligation which I have taken, cannot and must not be measured by the vote I have given or the one I may give upon this question.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who seems, next to his Maker, to know almost everything, from the long-horned cattle of Texas to the potatoes of the North, and everything else, does not know the condition of the people of my State and of the South. Our people are in extreme poverty; they are ground down by taxation and burdens heavy and crushing, imposed upon them by this Government and by a State government not of their choice, but a State constitution imposed upon them by Congress. Yet, to show their good faith and the credit they possess in the estimation of others, I will say that to-day their bonds in the market of New York rank higher than the bonds of any other State, except perhaps those of Massachusetts; they are above par.

There is an old maxim, a universal principle of law, deep and wide-prevailing, that a man should be just before he is generous; that he should discharge his obligations before he gives away his property. That should be as true of and as applicable to the Government as it is to the citizen. Your committee-rooms, our desks here, are filled with petitions and memorials and applications asking compensation for property destroyed and wasted and consumed by a set of lawless officials scattered through our country immediately after the close of the war.

Two years ago, and again this session, I introduced a bill into this House, and it was referred to a committee, proposing to refund to the people from whom it was taken some eight or ten million dollars for cotton seized by the Government long after the amnesty proclamation. The Supreme Court of the United States, by a unanimous decision, has decided that that property belonged to the people from whom it was taken, and that this Government holds the proceeds to-day in trust for these people. And they have decided that the oath of loyalty which is required of these people before they can have any claim for this property is void and unconstitutional; that the power of pardon and amnesty given to the President cannot be restrained or restricted by the legislation of Congress. That is the decision of the Supreme Court: they recognized the Constitution; they recognized its obligations. And if I had the time and power of speech, I would like to pay a tribute to that tribunal, that, amid the shocks of war and the passions of bad men, has stood firm to its traditional integrity and turned back the waves of bitter feeling and passion that threatened to overrun every right of property.

Now I will ask gentlemen if they are willing to give back to our people the money which you hold in trust for them? There was $60,000,000 of money taken from the South by means of cotton taxes when we had no representative upon this floor, when our voice could not be heard here. In reference to a further case which was carried to the Supreme Court, that tribunal divided, the Chief Justice not being present. And apply Judge Cooley's doctrine, that where the power to tax is doubtful the doubt should be given to the people. These people ought to have this money, from whom it was most unjustly taken. Yet who of these gentlemen are ready to-day to vote for the bill which I have introduced to refund this money in the form of your bond to the people of our States? And yet they come forward here and propose to lay an additional burden of taxation upon us of one and a half million dollars.

I have this further to say: gentlemen on that side, who have sought to show our constitutional power to do this thing, have wandered through the Constitution from one provision to another, like a New England tramp or carpet-bagger, in order to find some crack or crevice through which they might enter the treasury of the country and perpetrate this great plunder. They have gone through the Constitution, but they cannot locate this power anywhere. If I had the power of speech or the genius to depict the scene which the gentleman from Pennsylvania to-day and the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday tried to describe, when he spoke of our armies marching along, Federal and confederate, and the shout that would be raised when the bands struck up Yankee Doodle. I would refer them to what was done here this session, when almost the first proposition offered here from the other side was a resolution that Union soldiers only should hold offices in this House; that no confederate or rebel could be a watchman or a doorkeeper in this Capitol, and the promptness with which the senior member of that State voted for the resolution. How much patriotism was there in all that? Where did his patriotism come in there? He wanted our votes for this music, but here he could not dance to the music of rebels in this House.

I want to say this, that the men upon that side of the House, as well as those upon this, who were in the war, who witnessed its horrors upon the battle-field, its deaths, its carnage, its wounds, its blood, who heard the groans of anguish from the thousands of brave men upon each side who, as they gave up their lives, asked the mercy of heaven upon their companions and prayed for success for their flag, are not the men now seeking to revive the bitterness of that strife. But those men whose patriotism sent them to the rear in the hour of battle are the men who now have the courage to come forward for that purpose. I was opposed to the last war, and opposed it until my State seceded, when there was no use in further opposition. When I entered the war I did it as a man would stand up for his father and mother when they were wronged and insulted, and I gave the best service and years of my life to the contest. When it ceased, when our arms were laid down and our flag was surrendered, from that hour to this I have had no other object than to yield an honest heart and faithful obedience to all the laws of my country, and to keep faithfully the obligations which have been imposed upon us. I have gazed upon the stars in the flag which hangs over your head, Mr. Chairman, but to feel their stripes through the Freedmen's Bureau and your military government established over us.

But that time has passed, I trust never to return. I would not utter a word or do an act that would turn back the feeling of sympathy and kindness or reunion that is being manifested throughout this great land by all soldiers and true men on the one side and the other. Those politicians who never saw a battlefield, except that at Bull Run, (and they saw more of the run than of the battle then,) they are the men who now come forward and seek to array prejudices against better men than they are, and whom they did not meet in the hour of strife. And when they say that my silence gives assent to the harsh and false charges they make against us, I think respect for myself and a decent respect for the opinions of mankind compel me to say something in reply. It is merely in that view that I have said what I have.

I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and I do it with much cheerfulness, for he is a man who, having stood beneath the shadow of Bunker Hill and drawn inspiration from the scenes there enacted, having illustrated his courage in war and his statesmanship in peace, has had the magnanimity and the patriotism to make a speech upon this floor that will commend itself to the universal sentiment of the country when the "small fry" who have acted otherwise will be forgotten.

[Mr. BANKS addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. SWANN. Mr. Chairman, I propose to say a very few words upon this most important bill, and I will premise by stating to this House that I have been in favor from the time it was introduced here of the centennial exposition which we are now fast approaching. I am here, sir, as one of the Representatives of the State of Maryland—the State, Mr. Chairman, in which the illustrious Washington laid down his commission and bequeathed to an admiring people the results of his labors in the field and the glorious institutions under which we now live—I am here, sir, not for the purpose of making a sensation speech. I am a practical man, and I presume that the honorable Speaker of this House placed me in the position that I now occupy because he thought, that if I could consistently with the honor of this country, I would preserve, with my associates upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the peace of this great nation. And if, Mr. Chairman, my friends entertained that opinion of me, they have not been mistaken. There is no one who would do more to maintain our friendly relations with all the world and the honor and dignity of this country than the humble individual who stands before you.

It was a source of very great regret to me, Mr. Chairman, that the debate which engaged the attention of the House, within the last ten days, should have resulted in a condition of things which, as a representative from the State of Maryland, I could have desired had been otherwise. We have seen introduced here, a discussion on the reminiscences of our unfortunate war, which no man deplores more than I do. We have indulged in heart-burnings, in criminations and recriminations, which no State in this Union regrets more than the State of Maryland, and I am here to-day, to show our desire for peace and a forgetfulness of the past, by extending the hand of fellowship to every gentleman on this floor, be he democrat or republican, in all sincerity, and from an earnest desire to cultivate the most friendly relations with all. There is no man on the other side of the House to whom I do not to-day extend the right hand of fellowship, that our heart-burnings and bickerings may cease and we may go forward hereafter with a single purpose to maintain the advancement and honor of this country.

Mr. Chairman, I am here as an advocate of this centennial appropriation. I owe it to myself, and I think I owe it to my State, and I assure this House; and I believe I represent the people of the State of Maryland when I say, that we mean to cast our votes—I will not say as a united phalanx—for the object and purpose of this bill. My honorable friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who sits before me, has referred to the objects and plans of this Centennial. That gentleman, with whom I am in daily intercourse, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has explained what his plans have been as a member of the committee on finance of that association; and I will take occasion, sir, to refer to it here as an illustration of the manner in which that centennial exposition has been conducted, by the able and capable men who have been selected to preside over it. The gentleman from New York occupies a position perhaps one of the first in all that relates to the material prosperity of that great city, which he represents in part on this floor, and there can be found in the whole State of New York no more competent or reliable man. The confidence which his name and high character justify, and to which I deem it my duty to refer in this connection, as a member of the centennial finance committee, is due equally to that philanthropic and benevolent man [Mr. Welch] who has been placed at the head of the committee, and whose character and reputation are so well known to all. It gives assurance that everything has been done that can be done to protect the public interests, and I felt gratified that such a statement was made on this floor, by a gentleman so capable as the one making it, in whose hands I think the interests of the country will be safe. With your permission, sir, and with the permission of the House, I will read what that distinguished gentleman—a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and a member of the centennial committee on finance—said in reference to this matter and in this connection. I propose also to say one word in relation to the position of the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania:

> Of the $5,187,000 already raised the people of that State have contributed $4,700,000 and the remainder of the United States have subscribed $500,000. Pennsylvania has thus paid for every foot of space that will be occupied by American exhibitors, so that the other States will be the guests of Pennsylvania alone.

I read this, sir, because the House will find that it gives an assurance of the able and economical manner in which this whole business has been conducted in the raising of the money necessary to carry out this great exposition.

> Every dollar subscribed outside of that State has been appropriated to paying for the accommodation assigned to the foreign exhibitors, and if the other States had subscribed, as they should have done, enough to pay for this foreign space, no application would have been necessary to Congress. With a delicacy as rare as it is generous, Pennsylvania has refrained from referring to the fact that at her own cost and charge she has made ample provision for her sister States, proving by this act of self-denial that she is altogether worthy of the singular honor which she enjoys in being the birthplace of American Independence thus to be celebrated within her borders in its centennial year by all the people of the United States and all the nations of the world, including even the mother country from whom the memorable Declaration separated us politically forever.

And again, Mr. Chairman, I will say in reference to this explanation, that my friend expresses the opinion in another part of his remarks that this exposition will be largely reproductive to the country and that its salutary effects will not only be immediate but permanent. Now, sir, I attach the greatest importance to the testimony of this distinguished gentleman, occupying the position that he does, in the city of New York, connected with many of its great enterprises and with most of the prominent men representing that State, and he has given assurance to this House, an assurance that cannot be questioned for a moment as to honesty and directness of purpose, that this exposition will be economically and successfully managed, and that the country will realize the result he has indicated in his speech.

In regard to the State of Pennsylvania there has been a clamor here that she has done little, has not done what she ought to have done. Now, Mr. Chairman, I happen to know the facts. Pennsylvania has not only appropriated to the extent of her ability, but the city of Philadelphia has come forward with a zeal and determination to carry out this purpose which could not have been surpassed, in all probability, by any other State or city in this Union. The enumeration of the amounts subscribed will be found in the speech of my honorable friend before me, to whom I take this occasion again to pay a just tribute to the activity, energy, and enterprise with which the distinguished chairmen of the Centennial and Finance Committees have discharged the duties intrusted to their hands. And with regard to the city of Philadelphia, when we speak of the small amount she has contributed; when we speak of her indisposition to do what was expected at her hands more than she has done, it must be recollected that that city is now engaged in gigantic enterprises of her own. She is, sir, engaged in constructing an edifice which will cost when completed $15,000,000—a contribution to art, paid for by voluntary contributions of her citizens, unsurpassed in any part of the world, and which will redound to the honor and credit of that great city, and for which we cannot fail to admire her liberality and public spirit.

Mr. Chairman, when this centennial appropriation came up for consideration it was doubted whether or not it came here representing the Government of the United States, or whether Philadelphia designed to take charge of the whole appropriation now asked for at the hands of this House. I beg to say that I never supposed for a moment at any time that the State of Pennsylvania single-handed and alone was competent to provide the large amount necessary to give full effect to the measure, with a zeal better calculated to make it of such a character as to comport with the credit of the country and with the dignity of the nation.

It was asserted very early that the State of Pennsylvania meant to bear the whole burden of this enterprise; that she desired no aid from this Government. Now it seems to me that it was utterly preposterous to suppose that any such enterprise could be undertaken unless it was national in its objects, unless it relied upon the nation for the countenance that would be necessary to carry it out in such a way as would make it honorable to the dignity and position of the Government. I will do her the justice to say, and I take this occasion to say it, that she has covered herself with honor in the untiring efforts which she has been making, and which I am proud to say she has now nearly completed. And if this celebration is successful, it will add still more to the hold she has already taken upon the gratitude of the people.

Mr. Chairman, when the centennial was before Congress last winter, I, with other friends of the measure, watched with great interest the feeling of the country, as manifested both here and elsewhere, as to what was best and most practicable to be done by this Government to carry out what was then proposed.

The plan of a centennial exhibition, to show to the nations of the world our advance in power and greatness, was well received as a measure of national importance. It was, however, as you know, presented simply as a state enterprise; and there were those who boldly claimed, as they honestly believed, that the State of Pennsylvania wanted no aid whatever from the General Government. I regretted at the time that such a declaration was made, tending as it did to retard the action of this House and to lead to confusion and distrust among some who desired the prompt action of Congress upon the subject. I regret it still, as injudicious and ill-advised. The object to be accomplished was stupendous in its proportions and, as I believed then and still believe, beyond the power and resources of any individual State. While I did not desire to see the brave and patriotic State of Pennsylvania thwarted and kept back in so noble a purpose by any inability to do what her generosity and love of country had prompted, I could not but admire, in common, as I believe, with the whole country, the noble and patriotic zeal which prompted it.

I should be less than human, Mr. Chairman, and certainly less patriotic than I claim to be, if I could stand coldly by and see this brave and gallant State struck down in an effort which now and in all time to come, result as it may, must attach to her honored name.

Coming from Maryland, one of the original thirteen States of this Union, more closely allied than any of her sister States to the stirring incidents of our revolutionary history, I should be doing injustice to her if I did not raise my voice as one of her Representatives on this floor in advocacy of a measure which cannot fail to redound to the credit and glory of our common country now and in all time to come.

From the landing of the Pilgrims down to the present moment Maryland has watched with interest the steady progress of this great Republic, until she has almost reached the point of success in all that has been foreshadowed in the inauguration of the great event for which we are here to-day to give the national support required to insure success. Are we to falter in the discharge of this patriotic duty?

So far from doubt or hesitation at such a moment in voting the amount asked for in this bill to give national importance to what we may do to signalize the great events through which we have passed and to make the proposed exhibition the starting-point of a new era worthy of the past and an earnest of the assured future which is already beginning to dawn upon us, I am free to say that I would, if my vote would accomplish it, make the coming centennial free to the people of all the States of this Union, and bid them come in their strength to participate in the national jubilee, and to unite in convincing the world that the half had not been told of our power and resources as a nation.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose, in the limited time allotted to me, to refer now to the effect of such an exposition upon the nations who may witness the untold resources of the States comprising this Union; to our growing commerce, extending from ocean to ocean, from the rising to the setting sun; to our endless lines of intercommunication, binding together as with a net-work the North and South and East and West of this vast domain; to our minerals, comprising every production which God has vouchsafed to stimulate the enterprise and industry of a great and growing people; to our gold, and silver, and iron, and copper, and coal, and lead, and every other production of the earth calculated to give impetus to human industry. What a picture for the contemplation of the Old World! Single States, covering areas equal in breadth of territory to the domain of powerful empires, and comprising resources almost unlimited in variety and extent; mighty rivers stretching thousands of miles through regions teeming with the most valuable and tempting productions of the earth, and, last though not least, a climate combining all the elements necessary to promote health and give energy and activity to our people—such are some of the features of this centennial which cannot fail to arrest and startle the attention of the civilized world. No contribution, however extravagant, on the part of this Government can fail to bring a return, in its effect upon the power and greatness of this Republic.

Let us then, Mr. Chairman, one and all, unite in a patriotic effort to make it the wonder of the age, and the pride and glory of the American people.

I propose now to make a single remark in reference to the able and eloquent speech of my worthy friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER.] I do not propose to discuss with him the constitutional question which he has so ably referred to. I regret extremely that there should be any difference of opinion between that distinguished gentleman and myself. I have been taught to honor him as coming from my native State, and having affinities identical with my own in all that relates to the advancement and prosperity of the Old Dominion. I confess that it is a subject of extreme pain to me, that I feel bound to differ with the honorable gentleman, upon the constitutional questions which he has so ably discussed. My friend does not, perhaps, understand the position of that grave question in this House. He is not aware, perhaps, that this House is at variance—I will not say equally divided—in the views that we take upon these constitutional questions which he has treated with so much ingenuity.

I would say to him, however, having had an opportunity from experience, to understand the position of gentlemen upon the constitutionality of the power we have heretofore exercised, there is a large element here, of whom I rank as among the number, who have been opposed to any further restrictions upon the powers of this Government. I am one, Mr. Chairman, who will not consent to cramp by any concession of mine, the powers of the Government, as heretofore claimed and acted upon. They have become incorporated and interwoven with our legislation, notwithstanding the argument of my friend from Virginia and cannot be lightly or incautiously approached. It would be a mistake which we would never cease to regret. I want no more trammels put upon us than those which already exist; and there are some of those, not so firmly established by legitimate constitutional authority, that I would not unite in abolishing, if I had the power to-day. I have no fear of any encroachment upon the legitimate functions of the States; and all that I claim is that the constitutional powers which have always been heretofore recognized and acted upon should not be so far abridged, as to interfere with whatever is deemed essential to the successful working of our system. The people do not desire any such change, and it is questionable whether this Government would not be shorn of its best and most essential feature if it was brought under arbitrary subjection to any power higher than its own, or that it would meet the approval of the people any more than it does now.

This House has made large appropriations from time to time for the advancement of education, the embellishment of her public buildings, the inauguration of scientific expeditions, contributions to works of art, and many other objects of public interest requiring a large outlay of capital. Does the gentleman who has argued these questions so ably mean to hold us responsible for these expenditures, prompted by a mistaken view of our legitimate powers under the Constitution? Are we to be compelled to disgorge the money thus incautiously misappropriated? If so, would it not be better to postpone the further consideration of a subject so full of responsibility and surrounded by so many complications to the next great centennial celebration of our national independence, when many of those who are now so largely implicated, will have gone to their fathers, and passed beyond the reach of censure or applause? I commend this suggestion to the favorable consideration of the House.

The argument of the gentleman upon this question of constitutionality may have a most unfortunate effect upon the vote on this important measure. It is proper for us to recollect that we have heretofore contributed largely to perpetuate the powers which we claimed under the Constitution, and that by giving up those powers we should cramp the usefulness of this Government, besides subjecting those who differ with my honorable friend to censure and placing us in a position which may render it necessary that we should enter upon our own defense at some future time.

I would therefore suggest to my honorable friend whether it would not be better to postpone the agitation of constitutional points of every sort for the present until the centennial shall have become an assured success. I am sure that it would be gratifying to many gentlemen upon this floor. Does the gentleman mean hereafter to hold us responsible, when he shall have succeeded in establishing his point, to charge that we have done these things outside of the pale of the Constitution and without authority? We desire to know whether or not we shall be brought up to answer for what we have been doing in the past. I would therefore again recommend to him to postpone this discussion of constitutional questions until the celebration shall have been held, when many of us who have made ourselves responsible for these large appropriations shall be out of the way and shall have gone to our fathers to answer for whatever sins we may have committed in this connection.

Mr. LAWRENCE obtained the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] will yield, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to give notice to gentlemen who may desire to vote either for or against the bill that I hope to reach a vote on it to-morrow between two and three o'clock. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOOD, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOPKINS. I gave notice in the Committee of the Whole, and I now repeat it to the House, that to-morrow, say at two o'clock, I hope to reach a vote on this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to make a suggestion on that point. I suppose it is not improper to make known to the House that in another place notice has been given that the resolutions of eulogy on the late Vice-President will be presented to-morrow, and they will undoubtedly be sent here soon after the assembling of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. In addition to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has just said, the Chair will state that he has been notified of the purpose of the friends of the late Vice-President to bring to this House from the Senate appropriate obituary resolutions, and that they may come here quite early in the session of to-morrow.

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course I shall not oppose any obstacle to any proceeding designed to pay due respect to the memory of the late Vice-President.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILLS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the rules that propositions relating to improvements of rivers and harbors shall be filed at the Clerk's desk the same as post-route bills.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That Rule 134 be so amended as to include among the persons who shall be admitted to the privileges of the floor of the House the Solicitor-General of the United States.

REFUNDING OF COTTON TAXES.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1341) to refund certain taxes collected by the United States on raw cotton during the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, and to create a perpetual common free-school fund, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1342) for the relief of John Thompson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TONKAWA INDIANS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of War and of the Interior be requested to furnish for the use of the House of Representatives any information in the possession of their Departments touching the number and condition of the Tonkawa Indians at Fort Griffin, Texas, and what provision, if any, has been made for their care and protection.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 21, 1876.

The Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everlasting God, the only self-immortal, who dwellest in light unapproachable and full of glory, we bless and adore Thy name, and give Thee hearty thanks. Though we are mortal men and have our habitation in the dust, living under inevitable change, the years rolling over us so that we sink into the grave, yet hast Thou for us kindled amid this gloom the light of hope. As Thy servants turn aside this day to remember him who so late presided in this Chamber, we beseech Thee let the heavenly assurance fall upon them, as it did upon him, that Thou art their Father, Jesus their Saviour, the Holy Ghost their sanctifier, heaven their glorious heritance and lasting home, and all the host of angels and of the general assembly and of souls redeemed the bright and blessed company of their association finally and forever. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEATH OF VICE-PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I rise to present and to ask for the immediate consideration by the Senate of resolutions in honor of the late Vice-President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of HENRY WILSON, late Vice-President of the United States, and President of the Senate, and who had been for eighteen years of consecutive service a member of this body.

Resolved, That business be now suspended, that the friends and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the tribute to the memory of HENRY WILSON, late Vice-President, paid by American residents in Berlin, transmitted through the Secretary of State, which the Secretary will now report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

At a meeting of Americans resident in Berlin, holden at the American chapel on Thanksgiving Day, November 25, 1875, Mr. Nicholas Fish in the chair, it was Resolved unanimously, That we have heard with the most profound sorrow of the death of the Vice-President of the United States, HENRY WILSON, and as a tribute to his memory we desire to record our appreciation of the high qualities which distinguished him as a man and of the eminent and faithful services which in a long public career he has rendered the country by his undeviating devotion to the cause of the Union and adherence to the great principles of human liberty. That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the President and to the Senate of the United States.

The committee on resolutions: H. Kreismann, chairman; William C. Eastlack, Herm Rose, Jos. P. Thompson, A. H. Sylvester.

To Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY,
President of the Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, it is a satisfaction which the presence of death even cannot extinguish nor qualify that we may record the testimony which we are disposed to give concerning the character and virtues of those with whom we have been associated.

The late Vice-President of the United States was a member of the Senate for the period of eighteen years, and for nearly three years he was its Presiding Officer. No man was better known to the Senate, and, of his contemporaries no one was better known to the country. For more than a third of a century he had been in the public service of the State of Massachusetts or of the United States. The nature of his service was always the same. He was, at various times and by repeated elections, a member of each branch of the Legislature of Massachusetts, and for two years he was the president of its senate. This training was the best preparation which our system furnishes for service in the legislative branch of the National Government. In this service and for twenty years he gained constantly in the good opinion of the people of the State and of the country. Such a career was not an accident, nor was it due to what is called, usually, fortune or favoring circumstances. Indeed, there was no man of distinction among his contemporaries to whom fortune had denied as much. His parentage was honorable, and his ancestry for many generations, and without interruption on either side, was of New Hampshire blood and lineage; but they possessed neither wealth nor careful culture. The training of a child born into a family of wealth and high culture, without pretension or pedantry, is of more value for the affairs of the world than the education of schools and colleges.

Mr. WILSON had not the benefits of either, while many of his contemporaries enjoyed the advantages of cultured homes, cultured society, and the training and discipline of school, college, and university.

Others again, to whom these advantages were denied as to Mr. WILSON, were blessed with the tokens of genius, distinguishing them at once from the mass of men as worthy of eminence and crowning them in anticipation without apparent effort for themselves.

Mr. WILSON was not an orator; he had not the gift of eloquence; he had not the power of logical reasoning so as to command the assent of unwilling hearers, nor had he extraordinary aptitude for scholarly pursuits. By training and long-continued practice he became a clear, self-contained, convincing writer and speaker. At times he was more than this, and he exhibited occasionally something of the power and quality of the orator. His strength was chiefly, however, in the depth and earnestness of his convictions and in his knowledge of the subjects that he discussed.

The denial to him of the advantages of early careful training, either in his home or in society or in school, of high special gifts or unusual faculties in any of the qualities essential to the successful orator or writer, forces upon us the grave question, to what special form of genius, power of nature, or accomplishment of art was he indebted for the capacity for leadership in the great moral and political struggle of historical times? This question and its answer concern the American people, who raised him to the rank of a leader and trusted, honored, and sustained him as a leader, more than they concern the reputation or even character of Mr. WILSON as an historical personage. First, he was endowed by nature with an heroic resolution, which at once urged him to acquire knowledge and sustained him in his ceaseless efforts to accomplish whatever he undertook. The ability to labor was his second great endowment. As he had more obstacles to overcome than any other man that we have known, so he had more abundant means for overcoming the obstacles that were in his way. Resolution to work and ability to work are a substitute for everything except genius, and often they become even the rival of genius itself. The same restless, untiring spirit that he exhibited among men in the open day upon questions and topics of public political concern, whether of peace or war, animated him in his efforts to overcome the defects of early life, and finally to contribute to the history of the country a faithful narrative of the great contest in which he had acted so important a part.

But above all and over all as the chief of his endowments was his fearless, conscientious devotion to duty in political public affairs. He came into public life as a member of the whig party, but as the representative and exponent of the views and wishes of the workingmen.

The slavery question was soon forced upon us in the project for the annexation of Texas. The success of that project was followed by other measures designed to strengthen, protect, or foster the institution of slavery. To all these schemes Mr. WILSON was always and everywhere opposed. He used parties, he destroyed parties, and he organized parties, and all to prevent, first, the spread of slavery, and then to overthrow it. From the year 1840, when I first met him, he was the unwavering opponent of slavery. If other men made larger contributions to the intellectual and moral forces engaged in the war against slavery, he was chief over all the chiefs in the work of combining and organizing those forces for the political contests of 1850, 1851, and 1852 in Massachusetts, and for the national contests of 1856 and 1860, which gave the welcome triumph of freedom to a slavery-accursed Republic. His power in this respect was due solely to his capacity to present to others the moral and political considerations which ought to guide them.

As a member of the republican party, he was a strict party man. He believed in its principles, respected its opinions, exulted in its power for good, and gloried in its history. Ambitious personally he never allowed his private interests or wishes to interfere with the prospects of his party. No man yielded more readily to the opinions of his friends or subordinated local and personal claims to the general welfare.

During the entire war he occupied one of the most important posts in the Senate, and in that post he was first of all in the character and value of the services rendered to the War Department and to the armies in the field. When the war ended, he asked only that those who had been in arms should accept in good faith the new Constitution and the emancipated bondmen as citizens and equals in theory and in fact. If he had not the most prominent part in amending the Constitution and in providing legal means for the reconstruction of the Government, no other man did as much to remove the prejudices of the people, to encourage the timid, to arouse the indifferent, and, in fine, to render those great measures acceptable to the country. In this protracted and weary work he thought less of himself than of his party and less of his party than of his country; but he identified himself with his party in the interests solely of his party, and he vindicated his party as the only means of saving his country. Time and history will justify him in these particulars.

He was a politician, a party man, and a statesman as well. Of the political anti-slavery men of this country he is of the first and very small class, and history may, with justice to all, assign him a leading place even in that small class. When we consider the magnitude of the undertaking by which slavery was overthrown, the military operations attending it, in which he bore a conspicuous and honorable part in the public councils, the difficulties that waited upon every attempt to re-organize the Government, which he as much as any other man assisted in removing, and all crowned in his own life with full success, can his right to be counted among the statesmen of America be denied?

The preservation of this Government from 1861 to 1865 was a more difficult work than the maintenance of the Declaration of Independence from 1776 to 1783, and its re-organization was a more delicate task than the formation of the Constitution and the establishment of the Union in 1787 and 1789; nor can I doubt that these later events will contribute more largely to the welfare of the human race.

While slavery existed our example was shunned by many who otherwise would have been the advocates of republican institutions in other countries. Slavery has disappeared, and no argument can be drawn from our Constitution, and I trust that hereafter no argument will be drawn from our conduct or policy, calculated to prevent the spread of republican ideas.

As men prefer truth to falsehood, so they will prefer freedom and equality to authority and subserviency, and therefore we may predict the spread of republican ideas and the advance of republican institutions in other lands.

For these results and ends Mr. WILSON labored, and these results and ends, when realized, will be a better eulogy upon his life, character, and services than any pronounced in pulpit or Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, until a very recent hour I did not expect to participate in the proceedings of the Senate on this occasion, and I rise now for the purpose of seconding the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, and in a very few words to pay that personal tribute to the memory of our late Vice-President of which he and the work of his life are so eminently worthy.

In every age and in every country of the world homage has been paid to the great and the good; and still more appropriately has the custom obtained of paying a just tribute to the heroic and meritorious dead. The chisel of the sculptor and the pencil of the artist have been invoked to preserve their form and features for other times.

It is well, then, that we pause amid the stirring scenes that provoke discussion and sometimes bitterness in this Hall, now shrouded with the drapery of mourning, to pay a just and fitting testimonial to him who was so long a member of this body and so recently its presiding officer.

HENRY WILSON, though of obscure origin, neither learned nor eloquent, will justly stand in the history of our country as one of its remarkable men. Struggling under all the disadvantages of obscurity and poverty, and embarrassed in a position which would have deterred most men, step by step he advanced, until he occupied a seat in the Senate, and thence to the position of its presiding officer. No ordinary man could achieve that result; and it furnishes a striking example which illustrates the theory of our Government, and it should, nay, it will, afford a stimulus to others in their exertions for worthy and honorable advancement.

I became acquainted with Mr. WILSON when he took his seat in the Senate in February, 1855. I had known of him as a public man whom the State of Massachusetts had honored before that time, but I had not made his acquaintance personally until he came to be a Senator; and from that time until his decease our relations were of the most intimate character.

In running my eye over this body I find no Senator save myself who then occupied a seat on this floor.

What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue.

It was one of the last statements made by the late Vice-President, that more than eighty Senators with whom he had served had preceded him in death; and for the impressive lesson which it teaches us I may, perhaps, be excused for saying that during the time that I have been connected with the Senate as a Senator and its presiding officer more than one hundred and thirty persons with whom I have served and associated officially and personally as Senators have passed from earth.

Here Mr. WILSON won the respect of all, and by his zeal and industry succeeded in establishing the reputation of a wise and able statesman. Statesman he may be called. It is statesmanship that achieves results which promote the best interests of the country, and that Mr. WILSON did. During the dark hours of the war, as chairman of the Military Committee, his services were invaluable in preparing and carrying through the Senate all measures for raising, equipping, and marshaling our armies in the field. He was quick to see the wants of the Government and always prompt and ready to supply the remedy. The people of our country can hardly appreciate how much they are indebted to him for the faithful performance of the onerous duties that then devolved upon him, nor have I a doubt that the cause of that disease to which his strong frame at last surrendered can be traced to his excessive labors at that time. Of the valuable services rendered by Senator WILSON during the short session of 1861 General Scott paid him the high compliment of saying, "He had done more work in that short session than all the chairmen of the Military Committee had done for the last twenty years." It may with equal truth be said that his labors of that session were only a true index of subsequent and continued industry to the end. In the energy and untiring diligence with which he discharged every duty devolving upon him he had no superior in this body. To do right as he saw the right was his rule of action. Inured to toil from early life, to poverty and to privation, he was a most fitting representative of the State which he honored in his position; and it often occurred to me during the long years through which he held a seat here his State was most appropriately represented in her two Senators, the one of its labor and the other of its learning. His life was devoted to the welfare and elevation of our people, morally, socially, and politically. His able vindication of the free laborers of the country when they were assailed and stigmatized as the mud-sills of society demonstrates his sympathy with those who toiled, and upon whose work rested the prosperity of the country and by which alone can its permanency be maintained.

During his whole life he was an earnest and consistent advocate of temperance, which he made evident in his practical life, and was for several years president of the Congressional Temperance Society. The knowledge of the good works by him accomplished in this noble cause extends far beyond the limits of our country. The grand work of his life is to be found in his long and persistent efforts to break the shackles of the slave and let the oppressed go free. In the providence of God he lived to see the mighty work fulfilled; and for his efforts to this end, and in behalf of all the great measures to preserve the life of the nation his name will be recorded in imperishable history, while millions will cherish his memory. He was a Christian gentleman, and his life was adorned by Christian virtues, and in honesty and integrity, even in times like these, he stood unassailed and unassailable.

An honest man 's the noblest work of God.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, the emblems of mourning that darken this Chamber, and all the public buildings in this capital city, have reminded us for more than a month past that a man in high position, and one greatly loved by the people, has departed. One who had occupied a seat on this floor for more than twenty years as Senator and Vice-President was not here on the opening day of this session. He came here after the leaves had fallen, and a few weeks in advance of some of us, to be ready to enter anew upon his duties; but the invisible angel of death came into this Capitol with him, and laying a cold hand upon the Vice-President claimed him for the grave. A struggle of a few days' duration went on in a room near by this Chamber, and hope tantalized us all, but the insatiate conqueror who never knew defeat prevailed, and our friend was numbered with the dead. The form so long familiar to many of us is no longer seen among men; the voice that has so often echoed along these gilded walls in earnest and eloquent tones of protest against wrong, and of sympathy for the lowly and oppressed, is hushed forever. HENRY WILSON is dead! And we set apart this day to crown his memory, and to honor his character and services. What has happened to him is no uncommon thing, but rather the certain and common lot of all mankind. The dead many times outnumber the living, and the living must all die.

More than eighteen hundred years ago St. John described a great multitude of dead, "which no man could number." Tens of millions have been added every year since, till the imagination staggers in the attempt to comprehend the vast and constantly increasing number who sleep in the valley of death.

The battle of our life is brief—
The alarm, the struggle, the relief;
Then sleep we side by side.

My acquaintance with Mr. WILSON began more than twenty years ago, and I soon learned to respect and admire him for his many good qualities, both of head and heart. He was a good man, in that he cherished love for all mankind and always obeyed the impulses of a kind and generous nature. He was not a great man in shining qualities, but he was great in real, solid qualities. He was great in honest earnest purpose; in sagacity, in practical knowledge, and common sense. He was powerful in the advocacy of truth, and the rights of the people. He was a humane, sincere man, always leaning to the side of the weak and friendless. He always espoused the cause of the masses, and labored faithfully and earnestly for everything that tended to elevate the character and better the condition of his fellow-men. He instinctively scorned a mean action, and the man is not living or dead whom he ever intentionally wronged. A man's character, physical, mental, and moral, is molded largely by the climate, occupation, society, and other circumstances of his early life. Our lamented friend was born in the obscure and humble walks of life, and his pathway through childhood and youth was one of extreme poverty and toil. He learned by bitter experience the trials and wants of the poor, and to the day of his death he was the true and trusted friend of the people. He labored with the farmer in tilling the soil, and with the mechanic in the workshop, and here he became learned in common things and laid the foundation for that wonderful common sense for which he was distinguished.

We have seen him here many years with a learned colleague whose mind was trained and filled with the thoughts of other men, and yet in practical ability and common wisdom, which comes to minds attentive to their own thoughts, he was more than the equal of Charles Sumner. His early life was not wholly given to physical toil; his young mind was hungry for intellectual food, and found it to some extent. A good friend loaned him books, and he read many after daylight had faded into night. But, after all, the great book from which he learned most was the book of nature—a book full of all knowledge and one that no man has or ever can fully read or understand. This book is the work of the Infinite Author of creation, and is the fountain from which finite men gather materials for books and inspirations for thoughts. It is filled with the choicest poetry, music, prose, and the demonstration of all science and art. It is accessible alike to the rich and poor, and especially to the poor, and is to be found wide open in the field, in the forest, in the workshop, in the moving waters, in the singing of birds, in the habits of animals and the speech of men, in the earth below and the starry heavens above. Its language is universal, and he who can read it well and take in its great truths is not only a learned man but a Christian.

In after life and through his long public career Mr. WILSON was a student. He read and studied books, mostly of a practical kind, and closely observed men and things. He read less of poetry and fiction and more of history and biography. He was specially familiar with the history of all great struggles for freedom and human rights in modern times, and became a prominent actor in the contest that resulted in giving freedom to four million slaves and placing them upon the high plane of American citizenship. He was emphatically a self-made man, and like most men who have come up under adverse circumstances, and to whom God has given great powers, he was a strong man. He was strong in simplicity, strong in sincerity, strong in purity, and strong in earnestness. He was clear in his convictions, and bold and effective in maintaining them.

He was not an orator in the common understanding of that term, but he was a very able public speaker. He had the power to hold the attention of his hearers, and to carry conviction to their heads and hearts. This is the purpose and effect of true eloquence. He made many political speeches, and always with great effect. He never soared in imagination up among the stars to get lost in the "milky way," or strangled or bewildered his hearers in sentences a mile long. He spoke to the common understanding. He carried conviction by conviction. He pleased by his candor and truthfulness even those who differed from him in opinion. He built upon facts, and the structure stood after the sound of his voice had ceased. He interested his hearers by the honest utterance and honest faith of an honest man. He believed what he said, and a zeal which only comes from devotion to truth kindled corresponding fires in the hearts of his hearers. His purity of character was a great element of his strength. He wore no garment to conceal a deformity, but he was simple, plain, and honest in his every-day life. He was emphatically one of the people, and he studied the wishes, the interests, and the condition of the toiling millions with a heart always in accord with them and with an honest purpose to serve them. He knew their mode of reasoning and their wants with wonderful accuracy; he therefore become one of the best judges of popular feeling and popular demand in this country.

It is inevitable that such a man should become a favorite of the people. They honored, loved, and trusted him. I never realized this so fully as when his dead body recently passed through the city of New York on its way to Massachusetts. I rode in the funeral procession from Jersey City to Madison Square, a distance of several miles, and the sidewalks on each side of Broadway and all the streets leading into that great thoroughfare, the steps, balconies, windows, and roofs of buildings along the whole line, were densely packed with people. The procession was late in starting, and many thousands had stood for an hour in the cold to see the body of the people's friend pass. I never before saw any sight like it, and it was proof of the affection and confidence of the people which could not be mistaken. It was estimated that more than two hundred thousand men, women, and children witnessed the grand and solemn ceremony. It was agreed on all hands that nothing like this outpouring of the people had been seen in that city since the body of the lamented and immortal Lincoln passed to its final resting-place.

HENRY WILSON was a native of New Hampshire, and her people were ever proud of him. I mingle my own personal grief with theirs on this solemn occasion, and deplore the loss not only of his native State but of the whole nation in the death of this great and good man. I commend his character and noble example to the young men of my own and other States, in the hope that the Republic may long live through the intelligence of the people and a like patriotism, ability, and purity of its public men.

Within a little more than three years four natives of New Hampshire who have made honorable places for themselves in history have obeyed the summons which no man can resist, and gone the way of all the earth. The first in order of time was Horace Greeley, the great journalist. He never held any high official position, except a seat in the House of Representatives for a short time, but for a long time he was the head of the leading newspaper of the land, and wielded a power and influence unequaled by that of any other man on the continent. His head and heart were both large, and the world is much better for his having lived. Then Salmon P. Chase, Senator, governor, Secretary of the Treasury, and Chief Justice of the United States, passed to his final home. His was an honorable career, and history will record his great deeds. Next fell John P. Hale, my immediate predecessor in this body. For sixteen years he was a member of the Senate, and displayed great powers of genius. I have not forgotten, and the country will never forget, the time when he stood here, with Sumner, Seward, Chase, Wade, WILSON, Collamer, and Foot, all champions of a great cause, the cause of liberty and human rights. The last of the four to depart was HENRY WILSON, the late Vice-President, whom we honor and mourn to-day. No State can point to four nobler, purer, abler men who have served their country longer or better.

Of all the Senators who occupied seats in this Chamber when I first entered here as a member only five, including myself, remain. Two others who had been Senators before that time soon returned again and are now members.

Since the 4th of March, 1865, I have served with one hundred and sixty-nine different Senators—ninety-eight of them are no longer here—and I recall twenty-five who have passed over the dark stream of death. Such have been the changes in the membership of this body, and such the work of death among those who were or had been members in ten short years.

Every seventh man has closed his earthly record. So it has been, and so it must always be.

Ever since the world began the lessons of death have been taught. Man is here to-day and gone to-morrow.

Our brief journey here ends in the tomb, but faith points to eternal life beyond.

> Art is long, and Time is fleeting,
> And our hearts, though stout and brave,
> Still, like muffled drums, are beating
> Funeral marches to the grave.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the memory of a man dying in possession of a great place, endowed with high mental force, true to his convictions of right, and earnest in the discharge of duty, is a study which always commands respect and honor; and such a man was the late Vice-President. Of his devotion to his principles it may be truthfully said that this began at a period, and was displayed on a theater, where it required more than ordinary enthusiasm to keep the devotee unfaltering, and more than the average courage to keep him firm. But in his long public career no evidence occurs to insinuate that HENRY WILSON lacked either the enthusiasm or the courage required for his work; and that is saying much. But that which makes his pathway in life most interesting to me is the humbleness of his origin, the energy he displayed in raising himself to a higher level of life, and the blessed surroundings which enabled the poor, unfriended, but ambitious lad to mount from his native obscurity to the second place in the civil magistracy of a republic of forty millions of free, enlightened, and discriminating people. Of the earlier struggles and the cruel sufferings of his youth those who know intimately their particulars have spoken, and it is an important matter.

My knowledge of the dead Vice-President began after all these had been successfully overcome and passed. And I speak only of the acts of his vigorous prime and his public life. In the hotly-contested slavery agitation he was known, not as the earliest champion of universal freedom, but as the product of that determined polemical war that surged about him in his youth. His political bonds and party predilections were not strong enough to keep the natural enthusiasm of the young man in leading-strings; for, breaking away from these, he followed the dictates of his conscience rather than the teachings of mere political leaders. And so he came to this Senate the uncompromising representative of a cause many—perhaps a majority—of his supporters did not consider of primary importance at the time they concentrated their votes to send him to Washington. Like his great colleague he was chosen a Senator because the moving forces of that avalanche both did so much to precipitate had already divided the minds of men in both the old political parties in New England, so that neither could concentrate on men who opposed or ignored free-soil and its consequence, the abolition of slavery. Whether the coalition that sent HENRY WILSON to the Senate knew precisely what sort of man they were choosing, I cannot tell. But if they did not, then they builded wiser than they knew. He entered into the war of opinions like a true knight, and fought gallantly and faithfully.

As time wore on the great issue came to a head. The civil war broke on the land, and all political barriers were broken down for a time. Called on to take a somewhat active part in that tremendous struggle, I found it a matter of profound interest to study the characters of the public men on whose fortitude and steady devotion the successful prosecution of the war for the Union depended; for by the laws of Congress, passed to strengthen the hands of the Administration, only could the Administration act. And in that anxious penetration to discover uncompromising supporters, the late Vice-President was quickly set down as one in whom there was "no shadow of turning." In every measure designed to bring back peace by the only methods then possible to us, Mr. WILSON upheld the executive authority with an eager industry which left him no time for criticism or carping.

The first reverse to our arms caused many to pause, and some to doubt and fear. The answer from HENRY WILSON to that disaster was a request by him to the then Secretary of War for authority to raise a regiment for three years. This was eagerly given. And in a very brief time a splendid body of men came trooping along Pennsylvania avenue, as thoroughly armed and equipped as any regiment the world ever saw. His influence, seconded by the tireless energy of Governor John A. Andrew, supplied this excellent force; and then the colonel laid down his commission to resume his seat in the Senate, where his best services could be given to the country, leaving his second officer to lead the regiment in the field—a work for which he was especially fitted and carefully chosen. What followed is a part of the history of the nation HENRY WILSON so steadfastly loved. His patriotic constituents again returned him to this body. And then the country demanded of Massachusetts the son she had delighted to honor, that he might be yet further exalted. The grateful Republic placed him at the head of the body in which his life had been so useful and so honorable. And now we turn aside from the cares and duties of the hour to record, however feebly and imperfectly, our tributes to his patriotism, his devotion, his courage, and his purity. The patriot has gone to his reward, and we may gather lessons of wisdom from his successful and useful life.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, HENRY WILSON was early removed from parental guidance, but he fortunately possessed a resolute will and a sober sense of duty, which led to the pursuit of that course of life which to him, bound to hard labor, seemed best and which promised the most advantages to the growth of a young man whose habits had not been rooted in the precious memories of home example, and whose culture, in the land of schools, had been conspicuously omitted. His curiosity for reading appears to have been very early aroused and to some extent gratified, though in a desultory manner. The story of man in all ages, of peace and war, of liberty and despotism, of civilization and barbarism, and of his own relations to his maker and to his fellow-men, engaged his attention, and thus, while yet in obscurity, he laid the foundations for leadership among men upon the broad principles of democratic equality and upon the living sentiment of universal human liberty, which subsequently won for him national renown.

The late Vice-President belonged to the class of men most commonly described as self-educated, which, in this instance, as in many others, means that he had been endowed by nature with something more than a moderate share of brain-power, energetically supported by bone and muscle, but had received in his youth little or no artificial aid from schools. Of this outfit, however, he wasted nothing. Shunning no labor, his stock of useful information was ever increasing. It is no slender encomium upon HENRY WILSON that, as the successor here of the most classic orator of New England, of one who might have been called the finished product of culture and learning, he filled the place of Senator so well that he was never humiliated by unfavorable comparisons; and, whatever his deficiencies of scholastic learning may have been, his merits as a man and Senator were so plainly to be seen that Massachusetts, not without other ambitious resources, four times returned him to this body as the right man in the right place. With a long term still before him here, at the command of the nation he took the higher seat of Vice-President.

HENRY WILSON loved his whole race, and served the race next to his God. He sought their acquaintance—their approbation—and, when elevated himself to high positions, gladly mixed with common people, opening to them a great heart full of sympathy, and they admired and loved him in return. Rising from the mechanic's bench, and as much as St. Paul the master of a trade, he respected labor, and laborers first saluted him with honors. He spoke to them and for them, and they were proud of him. If he exalted their destiny he did not refrain from exposing their faults. If they were intemperate he denounced, not them, but intemperance. If they were idle, he set them an example of unflagging industry. If they were laboring for stinted wages, he urged employers to a more equitable division of profits. If they were illiterate, he showed how some knowledge could be gained by the evening blaze of tallow candles and by the light which breaks through the crevices of the early morning. When he lashed slavery he had at the same time pity for the slave-holder as well as the slave. When he lauded freedom he failed not to count the cost, and knew that it could only be sustained by an increased demand on the virtue and intelligence of both rulers and people.

In his speeches he never was betrayed into any ambitious use of language, and seldom decorated anything with borrowed scraps. It was enough if he was squarely understood, but he was ambitious to set forth such facts as would surely find a lodgment in the hearts of his hearers, and he never grew weary in the utterance of generous sentiments in behalf of the poor and the lowly.

In politics he belonged to the party of movement, and believed nothing politically right which to him seemed morally wrong, or that was susceptible of improvement. He would have men in high places teach by example. His patriotism was of the broadest character and always ablaze, and for those who had served their country as soldiers or sailors there were no wages too high, no pensions not earned, and no bounties undeserved.

HENRY WILSON was not a philosopher thoughtfully guided by profound research and unyielding logic, nor a wit who surprised and captivated his hearers with brilliant thoughts, nor was he eminent in any special branch of knowledge, and it cost him very little to change his opinion in matters of mere expediency if he found himself in error, or if he found later and better supports for a different opinion; but when once fully identified with any measure of principle, or with any matter that touched the tender sensibilities of his heart, he never deserted it, and had all the courage required to lead even a forlorn hope. If he was incapable of great essays on great subjects, he never lacked enthusiasm in a great cause, nor the will in such a cause to offer himself as "the man of all work," and he came to the front in shaping and pushing forward events. He was not only the earnest adherent of all measures for the advancement of the welfare of mankind, but he made his earnestness contagious. He was for thirty-five years conversant with public men and public affairs, and this gave elevation to his character and dignity to his career. He quickly fathomed the general sentiment of the public, and knew how to organize success. Officially he hardly aspired to be great, or to shine in the routine discharge of his duties, but as ever-stirring HENRY WILSON he was great; great in his confiding simplicity, his homespun integrity, his unbounded love of country, and his knowledge of men and their opinions. True, he sought office, but not for its trappings and emoluments; he sought it because he honestly believed, with the leverage of power to be obtained, he could be useful to his country, and seldom has the country been called to mourn the loss of a more unselfish public servant, a more courageous champion of human rights, or a more devoted lover of his country.

He was on the side of those who won in the contest for the emancipation of a race, and the result marks the age and satisfies a Christian world; but he never exulted over those who lost, and carried no trophies of the contest in his belt and no unspent anger in his bosom. All he asked was that no step backward should be taken, and that freemen should have the rights of freemen.

Little qualified as he might be supposed to have been for the work of a historian, yet, having selected the great theme of "The Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America," he fortunately was able here to concentrate his life-thoughts and to marshal the large array of facts which had long crowded his memory, or which he gathered with tireless industry, in so creditable a manner, so full and so fair, as possibly to make this, though left incomplete, the most prominent work of his life, and the one which may serve longest to perpetuate his memory and give the most enduring luster to his name.

He was a peace-maker. Careful himself not to give offense, he was pained when any strife arose among his associates, and made haste to obtain, if possible, explanations leading to a restoration of harmony and good-will. If successful, he at least was made happy. He was not ashamed of his poverty, and yet never failed to dilate with pride upon the amplitude of the wealth of his native land. He died poor, but rich in the greatest of estates—the affections of his countrymen.

Senators, we are witnesses that all of his capabilities, whether of nature or nurture, were ever actively employed—no fragment of his strength nor of his time ran to waste. If, as it occurs to most busy public men traveling toward the undiscovered country, his tired hand left unfinished some share of his projected work, we know he passed away in full faith that he was summoned to higher work, and, whatever he might here leave unwritten, that he would find his own name in the Book of Life written by a hand divine.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the eloquent tributes of respect to the memory of the distinguished dead which have been offered by the Senators who have preceded me. From their stand-point little could be added to their pathos, to their beauty, or to their justice; and yet I should feel that my duty were but half performed if I did not on this occasion tender to the people of Massachusetts the heartfelt sympathy and condolence of the Commonwealth of Kentucky upon the sad bereavement which, in removing from our midst the Vice-President of the United States, deprives that venerable Commonwealth of one of her most distinguished sons.

The life of HENRY WILSON is full of instruction. It is wonderful in its incidents; it is novel in its results. Its success is a just and beautiful commentary on American institutions. It is an example of their excellence; it unfolds their beneficence; it illustrates most grandly their equality.

His self-exertion was the key to his success. He was born in obscurity amid the wilds and snows of New Hampshire. Without friends, without influence, extreme poverty forced him at an early age into a close companionship with daily manual tillage of New Hampshire's sterile soil. He was cheerful, healthy, manly, contented, and industrious. His early years were spent in the Spartan simplicity and purity of New England life. Without books, he coveted knowledge. This very want created that very independence of thought which afterward became so prominent an element in his life. Self-wrought, self-reliant, HENRY WILSON was molded in that massive New Hampshire manhood of which Woodbury, and Chase, and Webster were the grander and more conspicuous types.

Subsequently agricultural labor was exchanged for the manufacture of shoes. In 1855, by self-culture and industry and study, the shoemaker of Massachusetts becomes the representative of Massachusetts in this Representative Chamber of equals. Seventeen years later and the humble cobbler of Natick by popular acclaim becomes Vice-President of the United States. What a struggle! What an issue! What a triumph! What incentives to virtuous and lofty exertion do the incidents of HENRY WILSON's life hold out to the industrious and friendless youth throughout the length and breadth of this broad land! And, as homage is paid to virtue as an incentive to it, how just, how meet, how proper, that the good, the great, and the noble should be honored and their names preserved!

This is not the time nor am I the person to enter into the consideration of the public character and services of HENRY WILSON, interwoven as they have been with the history of our country during periods of intense sectional excitement, including as they do a gigantic bloody civil war. HENRY WILSON was in my judgment more of an enthusiast and of a politician than of a clear, philosophical, well-balanced statesman. Liberty to him was an extravagant day-dream! Its very excess, without limitation, without restriction, in violation of law, was with him an accomplishment most earnestly, most constantly, and most sincerely desired.

Could HENRY WILSON have known it there were other statesmen in southern portions of the old thirteen States who, could they have willed it, would have gladly removed slavery. There were others, too, statesmen and patriots, bright luminaries in the State in which HENRY WILSON was born, and the State in which he subsequently lived, and where he now sleeps, who would have rejoiced to have seen slavery removed. But these wise men would have been regulated by law. They would have taken no step which did not find its sanction in the Constitution. Such statesmen were part and parcel of the brave men who won our liberties and then intrenched them in a system of self-government, binding together in a bond of constitutional brotherhood the glorious old thirteen States, that revered American Union which is reflected above us with the standard, shield, and insignia of every State always above us—that Union which was born of and created by the Constitution of the United States; that Union which its founders from every State of the original thirteen solemnly declared and pledged themselves should be perpetual, but in which the nascent zeal of some of their descendants, I lament to say, did not concur. But I forbear. The life, public character, and statesmanship of HENRY WILSON will be on another occasion and at another time intrusted to other hands. Be mine the privilege on this mournful occasion to speak only of traits in the character of the departed which commanded my admiration, and upon which, now that he is gone, I shall long dwell upon with melancholy pleasure.

I knew HENRY WILSON for eighteen years. When I entered the House of Representatives in 1857 Mr. WILSON had taken his seat in this Chamber but a short time before. My intercourse was formal but friendly. When I subsequently entered the Senate in 1871 he received me with a kindness and a cordiality which I can never forget. The official conduct of Mr. WILSON was always unexceptionable. As a Senator, he was dignified, urbane, kind, and respectful. As its presiding officer he was just, honest, and impartial, and sought always to do right. No man could have been more simple and more unostentatious in his tastes, or, as it seemed to me, more self-denying and frugal in his expenditures. But it is just to say that my intercourse with Vice-President WILSON extended only to public and personal intercourse in these halls. I never followed him into those closer circles of domestic life where all the virtues and all the affections of the human heart blossom and entwine themselves around the loved and dear ones who constitute that charmed circle of home. So far as I know—so far as I believe—HENRY WILSON was upright, virtuous, temperate, just, and, in the latter part of his life, when the meridian heats of party strife had given way to those clearer and more genial tints of the descending autumnal sun, his heart seemed to expand, and, as he more than once told me, its love extended to every section of the country. He said that he was tired of the strife and discord and sectional alienation with which the Congress of the United States had of late so much abounded.

But, Mr. President, he is gone—gone from us forever! He died suddenly. He died in the Capitol. He died with the harness on. His sun went down without a cloud upon its disk. Its last rays were clear and bright and tranquil. His spirit, we would fain hope, intrepid and unterrified, resting with faith upon his Saviour and on his God, was borne safely through the dark valley of the shadow of death. Peace to his ashes.

Senators, death it seems to me, of late years is entering oftener and more rapidly into this Chamber. Year by year the monitory messages of death addressed to our frail individual humanity come oftener and quicker, and they all bear to us but one sad, unwelcome truth—

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it has been common to allude to the history of men like HENRY WILSON as peculiarly American, and to declare that such careers are possible only under republican institutions. Nothing could be further from the truth. The world has had few leaders who were born to an inheritance of power. Its real kings have not been the sons of kings. Its acknowledged monarchs have not descended from monarchs. The founders of its philosophies have not been the children of philosophers, nor of its dynasties the heirs of emperors. The framers of the creeds, the inventors of the faiths and religions of the human race have come from the manger, the forge, the carpenter's bench, and not from the church. The great leaders of its armies have not sprung from warriors; and those who have written the dramas and pronounced the orations that are immortal have not inherited their passion nor their eloquence. A pedigree may be gratifying to pride, but it is not consoling to ambition.

The choicest products of nature are developed in her valleys, and not on her summits; and in the lower social strata we find the origin of the most successful men.

In the profession of public affairs or statecraft, it may be that the operation of this universal law is more apparent under a political system like ours, where the hard restrictions and limitations of custom, precedent, and convention do not prevail; but our history gives ample illustration of its truth. To discriminate among the living would be ungracious, but if we inquire who among the illustrious servants of the Republic in the past have most ineffaceably stamped their ideas and purposes upon the institutions and irrevocably shaped the destinies of the nation, the answer would designate those who had not been favored by birth or fortune. Jackson and Lincoln among the Presidents, Webster, Clay, and Douglas among the statesmen, are imperishably associated with the first century of the Republic. Emerging from an obscurity more profound than either of these, and reaching an elevation that gives him a permanent position in our history, HENRY WILSON demands to-day the last formal recognition and tribute that his country can extend to his acts and his fame.

The story of his life has been told by his successor, whose powerful delineation of his character and services has left nothing to be recounted save the lessons of his marvelous career.

It is perhaps not too much to say that he succeeded less in spite of his disadvantages than because of them. The defects of his training and scholarship, the laborious poverty of his youth, the humble avocations of his early manhood, were favorable to his fortunes. They kept him on a level with the masses of the people and enabled him to interpret their purposes with prophetic accuracy. It was by reason of this that he became a popular orator without being eloquent, that he became a voluminous author without the advantages of preliminary education, that the men of Massachusetts ignored their patricians and sent the Natick cobbler to the Senate, and finally to die in the Capitol of the nation.

He possessed in an eminent degree that peculiar assemblage of physical, mental, and moral qualities that are requisite to political success in a popular government. He was from and of the people pre-eminently; not alienated from them by extraordinary endowments or great wealth or superior culture, but exhibiting only a higher degree or a more vigorous activity of the virtues and powers that are common among men, industry, diligence, patience, and scrupulous integrity. So that the great body of citizens in supporting him seemed to be indirectly paying a tribute of respect to themselves, and not yielding either a willing or reluctant obedience to a superior or ruler.

But no public man, whatever may be his qualifications, can succeed unless he identifies himself with some idea or conviction existing in the minds of the people. He who would lead must follow. And in this respect the Vice-President was especially fortunate. He entered public life at the comencement of that great revolt of the national conscience against human slavery, and thenceforth he devoted all his energies to its extinction. He became one of the great exponents and representatives of this idea. It gave form, substance, and complexion to all his efforts. He mastered its statistics, defined its purposes, and in the great contest that followed he bore a notable and conspicuous part. He gave expression to the resolve of the loyal milions that in the country of Washington the creed of human liberty should not be an unmeaning formula nor the brotherhood of man an empty dream.

This is the measure of his work and its reward.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I met Mr. WILSON for the first time in March, 1873, when he administered to me the oath as a Senator. A few days afterward I called on him at his lodgings to pay him my respects, and a short time after this he returned me the visit. This was the extent of our intercourse, besides exchanging a few friendly words on the floor of this body. I therefore cannot claim to have known him personally very well; but his history as a public man is not unknown to me, and it is in this character that I desire to speak of him on this occasion. His career was certainly very remarkable, and both suggestive and instructive. He was born in New Hampshire, but it is as a child of the old State of Massachusetts that he is known to the world. We are informed that he was born in the humblest station and had no advantages of early education, compelled at the outset of life to learn a trade so as to earn his livelihood.

The State in which his lot was cast is known for its wealth, social refinement, high education; for its numerous men of distinction in all the professions, and also for its large number of distinguished public characters, many of whom have been known to the country as men of the most exalted abilities. It was among such men and in such a society and under such circumstances that he had to make his way, from way down, up to fame and to distinction, and yet he successfully secured both. Was this the result of accident, of what is vulgarly called luck, or was it the reward of great intellectual gifts? It was neither. Mere luck will not secure such a prize. Yet there must have been something in his character to have enabled him to accomplish what he did accomplish. Luck or favorable circumstances alone will accomplish nothing.

But the existence of favorable circumstances, which exist at some time or other for all men, in all countries, in all ages, and under all forms of government, wisely and intelligently understood and firmly and with a fixed purpose taken advantage of, will lead to fame or fortune as may be desired. Men of action—I mean by this that class of men who acquire either political or military fame—never have acquired or ever can acquire distinction without favorable circumstances. Washington would have lived as an intelligent and good farmer in Virginia, and never have been known to the world, without the circumstance of the American Revolution; yet this circumstance was not of his creation. It may be safely said that other men did more at the outset to bring it about than he did; yet he wisely took advantage of it, and it enabled him to secure a name and fame without a parallel in the world. So it may be said of Cromwell. Without the English revolution he would have died unknown; yet, taking advantage of it, he ruled not only the destines of England but of Europe, and, indeed, of the world for a time. So it may be said of Napoleon. Without the French revolution, with the beginning of which he was in no way connected, he would have lived and died on the island of Corsica; yet, the circumstance of this great uprising of the French people occurring, he took advantage of it, and he too for a time ruled the destinies of his country and of Europe, and acquired a name for military genius and broad statesmanship unequaled by any one in any age of the world.

The circumstance which presented itself to Mr. WILSON was the slavery question. He saw as he believed—and as events have turned out, he did so with a remarkable prescience—that it would become the great question of his day, particularly in his section. He early identified himself with it, and as it acquired strength and popularity he rose with it. Showing at the outset an intelligent comprehension of the question, and exhibiting purpose and firmness to rise or fall with it, its success was his success; and so it may be said of the three great characters first mentioned. Had the great events with which they had linked their destinies failed, they too would have failed.

Thus, Mr. President, it is seen that it is not mere brilliant genius and high intellectual endowments which secure the largest prizes in fame's lottery; but purpose, will, manhood, courage, all presided over by intelligence, although this intelligence may be infinitely below that of Lord Bacon. Hence I say that the life of Mr. WILSON is instructive to the millions of poor and obscure boys, however humble, who are scattered throughout this broad land, and surely none can start from a humbler position than he did; and as he attained fame and distinction, and died holding the second office in this Government, to which he had been called by a majority of his countrymen, why may not many other poor and obscure boys do the same! They need not fear the want of favorable circumstances; they in some shape or under some peculiar condition exist always in each and every generation.

Our epoch will be marked in history for having given birth to three men, each one of whom was born in such lowly condition as to be nearly beyond the power of full realization. Yet one of these men became by election the President of this country, and the two others were elected to the second highest office—Lincoln, Johnson, and WILSON—all contemporaries, all in public life at the same time. Many years ago, in a debate in the House of Representatives some one said that General Jackson had no education. Mr. Randolph of Roanoke replied that this perhaps was true, but that Jackson knew how to make his mark. So it may be said of these three men; they had no education, or at least no perfect education, being all self-taught, but each and all have made their mark in indelible characters upon the pages of our history.

This occasion is suggestive to me of another great fact—the march of empire, the spread of our grand system of free government, which opens its portals wide and broad to all the youths of this country, regardless of the advantages of family, wealth, or high social position. Mr. WILSON was a child of New England. At the time of his birth, my native State, which I in part have the honor to represent on this floor, was the outboundary of the Republic, the home of a few French Canadians, whose forefathers had penetrated more than a hundred years before the vast wilderness of the West as hunters and trappers—the true pioneers of the valley of the Mississippi. Missouri was then in what is known as the first grade of territorial government, and had within its extended boundaries less than thirty thousand inhabitants. Now it has a population of two millions. The secret of this rapid growth, this vast extension, is to be found in the beneficent system of republican government, which tells in language not to be mistaken to all the youths of this country, the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the perfectly educated and the self-educated, that the rewards and honors of the great Republic belong to all, and will be awarded to the most meritorious. Like the contest in the garden of the Hesperides, the race is open to all—Athenians, Spartans, Bœotians, and Macedonians. He who shall prove the swifter in the race will secure the golden apple.

Mr. President, in conclusion I will say that it is my nature—perhaps the effect of the circumstances which surrounded my own early life in the wilderness of the West, among the rugged but honest and brave pioneers of that country—to entertain a profound admiration for such characters as Lincoln, Johnson, and WILSON—men who were the architects of their own fortunes, and who relied alone on their own brave hearts and strong arms and a beneficent Government for the fame and name which they achieved.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have had no time or opportunity to prepare a fitting eulogy; and I can only utter those thoughts that are uppermost in my mind in regard to HENRY WILSON. He was a man of very marked characteristics, and his public career in some respects stands out from all the statesmen of his day. Born in poverty, as has been said, having no advantages of early education, without riches and influential friends to push him forward in the world, he was the architect of his own fortunes, and it may be said in a very peculiar sense he fought his battles alone. He had no partisans. He cared little for public patronage; but he relied upon the strength of public opinion and the principles which he advocated. His great strength was in his convictions. He was a man of ideas, and relied upon ideas for his success. He was a man of courage. He dared to follow his convictions wherever they led him, and he was brave enough to refuse to fight a duel in this capital at a time when the spirit of duelling ruled here and heaped ridicule upon every man who refused to acknowledge the "code."

The world will acknowledge hereafter that HENRY WILSON was right upon all great questions affecting human liberty and the progress of the age. His political career was cast at a time when there was more attention paid to the discussion of the fundamental principles of our Government and the rights of man than to mere economic questions; and it was in the consideration of such questions that he derived his fame. He was not a man of brilliant or showy talents, but he was a man of great talents, if we can judge by results accomplished. Many acquire reputation for great talents who never achieve anything; but HENRY WILSON, without having that reputation, did achieve great results.

He was essentially a practical man. I was associated with him on this floor for six years as a Senator, and during all that time I never knew him to advertise an effort; I never knew him to speak for the applause of the galleries. He spoke only to convince the Senate and to accomplish the purpose he had in view. But, sir, it is doubtful whether any man of his time had more influence upon public opinion than had HENRY WILSON. The country had confidence in his devotion. He was right upon the great questions, and the country will come to believe that. He was a quarter of a century in advance of his time.

There is one respect in which the character of HENRY WILSON as a statesman will stand out from the men of his time, and that is as the representative of the workingmen. Of humble origin, brought up to labor, all his sympathies were identified with that class of our countrymen. Respecting scrupulously the rights of property and of capital, yet it was always his purpose and seemed to be his aim to elevate the laboring men. He desired their education and sought in every way in his power to alleviate their condition, both male and female.

His life was somewhat lonely, especially the last years of it, going into society sometimes, but never fondly. He preferred his studies, and his great object was to complete the work upon which he was engaged, The Rise and Fall of the Slave Power. He did not quite succeed in that purpose. Had he been spared a few months, perhaps a few weeks longer, the work would have been finished. I have frequently heard him speak of it fondly, and of his great desire to complete it. He wanted to leave that as the literary record of his life.

He was kind hearted. I believe he never entertained malice. I do not remember that I ever heard him speak unkindly of any one, and while earnestly maintaining the Union and zealous in suppressing the rebellion, he seemed to entertain no malice toward the men who originated the rebellion and carried it on. He seemed to believe his work was done when slavery was abolished and the rebellion was suppressed. Taking a deep interest in reconstruction, he seemed to believe that that was a thing to follow as a matter of course, and that victory was won in the destruction of slavery and suppression of the rebellion.

A man of simple character, utterly indifferent to display, and seemingly indifferent to fame, yet undoubtedly keenly alive to the good opinion of his countrymen, he has left behind him a memory that ought to be cherished, and, as has just been said, he is an example to the youth of our country of what can be accomplished by sound sense, by industry, by patient devotion to study.

He was emphatically a self-made man. No man this country has ever produced was more clearly entitled to that distinction. As I before said, he fought his battles almost alone; he fought without those aids that often elevate men to power and distinction. He has won a great name that will grow brighter and brighter as time passes on.

I cherished for him a warm friendship. I met him first in 1855, in the State of Indiana. It was about the first appearance I had made in the political field. A public meeting was held in the city of Indianapolis on the occasion of the aniversary of the ordinance of 1787; I think it was on the 13th of July. I heard him make a speech there, and it was my privilege to follow him in a short address, and he spoke to me on that day words of kindness and of encouragement that I shall never forget. A friendship began then which grew stronger and stronger until he was taken away. I shall personally revere and cherish the memory of HENRY WILSON, and so, I believe, will all who knew him well.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, it was well said by my friend from Kentucky that the life of HENRY WILSON forms a chapter of American history full of instruction; it is full of cheerful instruction, full of hope to languid patriotism, full of encouragement to ingenuous youth. In his desolate and unprotected childhood, in the early struggles, through which his faculties developed into strength and his virtues hardened into consistency, in the steadfast purpose and the great results of his manhood, we have an illustration and a vindication of free institutions. With no advantages of birth or connection, he outstripped, in the career of life, those who started with him in the enjoyment of them all. The strength that he acquired in overcoming obstacles that friendly hands had removed from the paths of others enabled him to meet, with greater vigor, those obstacles which every man must encounter for himself. Without assistance, at the age when assistance is most needed, with little sympathy, till he had won a position that made him independent of it, he raised himself to the second place in the Republic, and, in the minds of many, was designated for the first.

I do not purpose to delineate his character, or to recount the story of his life. I should only repeat what has been better said, here and elsewhere, by those to whom the grateful duty was most appropriate. Enough that, in an age too much devoted to the pursuit of wealth, he carried his contempt for money to a fault; that in a time when the luxuriousness of private life invaded the purity and threatened the safety of society, he preserved the simple habits that best become a republican magistrate; that as he had borne adversity without murmuring and with unconquerable determination, so he bore success with moderation; and that in all his high employments, the possession of power never provoked him to insolence in the exercise of it. I will not adduce, among the evidences of his merit, that his personal character mainly escaped calumny, for the best men in public life are not the least vilified, and political malignity seeks not the justice but the occasion of assault. But even that malignity could find little upon which to fasten its fangs in one whose chief use for money was to give it to others, and whose only use of power was for the public good.

Nor was the occasion of his death inappropriate to his life. It has been lamented that the inevitable hour found him away from his home, and without the tender ministrations of woman. In this regret I do not share. Where should the patriot warrior die rather than on the field of battle or on the slippery deck, with the flag of his country victorious over him? Where should the patriot statesman whose life has been devoted to freedom die rather than in the Capitol, whose uplifted Dome bears aloft the vindicated statue of Liberty.

And home he had none. No man shared more largely in the affections of the American people; no man was more beloved by his immediate constituency; but those pleasures which the greatest of American orators placed above all the other immeasurable blessings of rational existence, above the treasures of science and the delights of learning and the aspects of nature, even above good government and religious liberty, "the transcendent sweets of domestic life," were no more for him. Those relations which nature intended for the joy and the rapture of our youth, for the happiness and the embellishment of our maturer years, for the comfort and consolation of age, had been severed by the remorseless shears of fate. No eye grew brighter when he raised the latch that held his lonely dwelling; no outstretched arms of wife, no ringing laughter of children, welcomed his returning footsteps when he crossed the threshold over which all that had given life, and joy, and beauty to that simple abode, and had lighted it up with a glory not of palaces, had been borne never to return. He had nothing left to love but his country. It was proper, then, that he should die here, here where his greatest work had been wrought, here where his greatest triumphs had been achieved, here where his voice had been raised, till the outer corridors had echoed back his words, for truth, for justice, for right.

It was proper that from yonder Chamber, to which the suffrages of his fellow-citizens had carried him, he was borne to his final place of rest. He entered that town, for the first time, a friendless lad, all his possessions carried in a bundle which swung lightly in his hand. He entered it, for the last time, accompanied by the pageantry of a nation's woe, with muffled drums, and arms reversed, and banners draped in black; from a thousand heights the flag of his country drooped at half-mast; from fort and arsenal and dock-yard the booming of a single gun, at solemn intervals, announced the progress of the sad procession. Tender and loving hands received him; friends and neighbors, who loved him because he was good, even more than they admired him because he was great, stood tearfully around his open grave. The bleak winds of a New England winter came down from his native hills, and moaned his requiem through the leafless trees. And there, with swelling hearts, but with unfaltering trust in the eternal promises of God, they laid his manly and stalwart form to mingle with the dust of his kindred.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the life and work of the late Vice-President were in all respects so remarkable that they challenge the study and admiration of the American people. The biography of distinguished men, the richest of a nation's treasures, will yield large space to the one, and the record of great and noble achievements, a nation's proudest monument, will comprehend the full measure of the other. And yet, to the most intimate friend and companion, the lesson is not easy. That life so fitly closed in the Capitol of the nation to whose salvation and glory it was consecrated, and that work so graciously terminated at the goal of all his desires, have neither prototype nor parallel. Each stands out alone by itself, and is unlike any other that has gone before or survived it. He lived from infancy to the end as no other man has lived. He worked, from his first entrance into public life till his departure, as no man ever worked before him. He was a creation, a specialty, a force all by itself, and yet ever in the midst and always potent. No one could tell how he had attained to this individuality, and yet no one would correctly calculate the resultant of the ever multiplied and conflicting influences bending political opinion who ignored this factor.

Of so obscure and humble an origin that whenever friendless poverty sought for a type or representative, his name was spoken before any other; of a public life so pure and upright amid temptation and sin that his example was held up for imitation before all others; deprived of opportunities for the acquisition of knowledge as no other in youth or manhood, he nevertheless sought out or created them, and availed himself of a breadth of study far more than others to whom opportunities come unbidden and among whom learning scatters her treasures with the most lavish hand. He studied men more than books, and his education came from personal contact with the practical affairs of life, and not from the study of other men's acquisitions in knowledge. His whole life bore unmistakable evidence of the school in which its lessons were learned. Tested by the standard of those the world calls learned he was no scholar, but tried by that which the world calls safe, practical, useful, he was wise beyond his generation. While he read books some and profited much by their perusal, he read men more and thereby gathered a larger knowledge of the practical duties of life than it was possible for him to have acquired in any other way.

He had not genius, but he had what is more certain of success, industry and fidelity, and their rewards crowned his endeavors. No one can understand or properly estimate his character or career except by a study of the elements which formed the one and furnished the instrumentalities which wrought out the other. It was impossible that he should be like other men, because the very food which was his necessity the multitude of men shun or escape. And thus it is that only by a proper study of the school in which the heart and head of HENRY WILSON were developed can be found the key to that remarkable life and noble work whose sublime termination we seek by these ceremonies this day to commemorate.

The world upon which he first opened his eyes was an utterly barren waste, and nowhere, in all his journey through it, did any green thing gladden his sight which his own hands did not plant and his own fidelity water till it bore its legitimate fruit; nowhere an opportunity for improvement or work, nor an instrumentality for the accomplishment of good, which his own courage and indomitable will did not pluck from the very jaws of an adverse fate. And thus he was never educated for his life-work, but only in and by it, and he grew to fitness for it, and to a marvelous power in it, just as the right arm of the blacksmith grows strong through the very blows it strikes.

When taste led him into politics in 1840 he was without education in public affairs, without experience as a speaker or any of the natural gifts of an orator. But he had convictions. He believed that, under a Government by and for all, it was the duty of all to study and to understand their relations to it and their duties and obligations under it, and in that sense to be politicians—honest, earnest, aggressive politicians. And in teaching others he taught himself, till he became one of the most efficient political teachers and leaders in his generation. The logic of the schools and the arts of the rhetorician he never studied and never knew, but of the logic of events and the eternal fitness of things he seemed to have intuitive knowledge, and in the enforcement of their lessons he was remarkably effective. He had the courage of his convictions, and he followed them, sometimes, though seldom, into the wrong, but still he followed them fearlessly, across party lines, into strange company, into seeming inconsistencies, and into danger if need be. Wherever they led there he followed.

Mr. WILSON was a hater of slavery and every sort of oppression and infringement on human rights from his boyhood. He could not have been otherwise without being false to himself and all the experiences of his life. War on these wrongs became to him a mission, and he took upon himself its work with vows and covenants, never faltering so long as there was work to do. He subordinated to it all party ties and relations, keeping company with political associates and acknowledging fealty to political organizations only so long as this higher purpose of his life could, in his opinion, be promoted thereby. This led him to become a disturbing element, disorganizing old parties and organizing new ones. He was a revolutionist in politics, and bore a conspicuous part in every great political revolt existing organizations have encountered in his time. He first came upon the stage as a young whig orator in the great political revolution of 1840 and participated actively and efficiently in the memorable campaign which in that year brought the whig party into power. With more zeal, as he grew in years and in strength, did he lead in 1848 in the organization of the free-soil party for the destruction of both the whig and democratic parties. In 1851 and 1852 he was the master-spirit of a coalition between the free-soil and democratic parties in his own State in a successful campaign against the whig party of that State, dislodging it from power and dividing the offices between the allies, placing Mr. Sumner in the Senate and a democrat in the governor's chair. In 1854, he was one of the leaders in the organization of the American party of that day, which overwhelmed in a common defeat the whig, democratic, and republican parties, carrying down, by his own efforts, his own name at the head of the republican ticket for governor of the State. By this party he was himself elected to the Senate of the United States. In 1855, he again led, in the councils of that same American party at Philadelphia, a revolt which dismembered and disbanded it on its first attempt to control national politics; and in the following year he was found earnest and foremost in the work of organizing and preparing the present national republican party for its ultimate triumph in 1860. With this party in its avowed work he continued to act during the remainder of his life. He had often in those years to answer the charge of vacillation and inconsistency and a desire for office and power regardless of the means used for their attainment. He met all these accusations with the bold announcement that, with him, neither place nor power nor party was anything but means to an end beyond and above them all, and that he would never seek nor serve either except for the attainment of that end. He outlived many years the adverse criticisms and enmities this course engendered; and, as in later years, amid the great events in which he bore so prominent a part, his untiring zeal and absolute devotion to the political elevation of the down-trodden stood out to be read of all men, the general public judgment accorded to him a sincerity, sagacity, and statesmanship in these frequent changes of political relations which were not universally conceded at the time of their occurrence.

Mr. WILSON rose rapidly from his first entrance into public life in 1840. He was a member of the lower house of the Massachusetts Legislature by repeated elections, four times a senator, and twice the presiding officer of that body. He was also a leading and influential member, among the ablest men of the State, of the constitutional convention of 1853. He was several times candidate of the party with which he acted for governor of the State and for Representative in Congress. In 1855, in one of those remarkable political revolutions before alluded to, he was elected Senator of the United States, and took his seat in this body in February of that year. By repeated and nearly unanimous re-elections he held the office of Senator eighteen years, and resigned it only to assume the duties of the office of Vice-President, to which he had been elected in 1872, and which he held till his death in the National Capitol on the morning of the 22d of November last.

How he acquitted himself in the many positions of public trust and responsibility to which he was repeatedly called by his own State the people of Massachusetts bear testimony to-day in the sincere mourning which fills all hearts, and in the universal feeling of irreparable loss which finds expression in all her borders. How he bore himself in this broader field and under the weightier responsibilities and graver duties which the place and the times devolved upon him is personally known to many of you, Senators, before whom he went in and out daily in the patient and self-sacrificing performance of the work allotted him, and is now commended by a universal public judgment. He entered this body six years before the war; years of civil strife and commotion ripening into rebellion; years big with the great events and greater consequences of that national conflict. On the one side were arrayed Jefferson Davis, Toombs, Hunter, Butler, Benjamin, and their compeers, if not as yet menacing, certainly intense, bitter, and uncompromising. With them, by party affiliation, though not in sympathy, and vainly struggling against the current of party policy, were Cass and Douglas. On the other side, with whom WILSON took his place, were, in the early morning of the struggle, Clayton, Crittenden, and Bell; and, all through its heat and burden, Wade, Fessenden, Trumbull, Hale, and his own great colleague, Mr. Sumner. The world has seldom, if ever, witnessed a more imposing array. Among the questions debated and determined were the repeal of the Missouri compromise, the Dred Scott decision, the forcing of slavery into Kansas and a government of slave-holders upon her people, the hunting of fugitives from slavery in free States, and other kindred measures, involving the very existence of the Republic. Never has the world listened to a debate on which were staked such momentous issues. Among these great men and in these great arguments Mr. WILSON was neither silent nor weak, but earned a national reputation. He was placed at the head of the Military Committee of this body at the beginning of the war, when its responsibilities and duties assumed an importance never known before. The records of the Senate and the contemporaneous testimony of the high officials who leaned on this committee for support in the exigencies of the war furnish ample evidence of the great ability and marvelous industry with which he met the difficult and delicate questions and incessant labors of this new position.

The close of the war brought to Mr. WILSON no release from active public service. He supported earnestly and most efficiently that series of great measures rendered necessary in the rehabilitation of the rebel States, and which ultimately wrought those grand changes in the organic law of the land that will ever mark this period as an epoch in the world's history. Some of the most important of these measures originated with him, and in the final shape and reach of others may be traced the wise and practical counsel, never stumbling over forms nor missing the substance, which so characterized all his work. The complete history of the Republic during the eventful years of his service here—a history not yet written—will alone do justice to the indefatigable endeavors and the broad and patriotic statesmanship of HENRY WILSON, and to its judgment his name and fame ma be safely committed.

The personal character of Mr. WILSON was full of noble qualities, endearing him to his friends while living and making his memory a constant delight. Kindness of heart seemed to mellow his whole nature. There was in him neither selfishness, nor envy, nor hate, and only generosity, charity, and good-will. He would empty his pockets and borrow of his neighbor to relieve suffering humanity stretching out its hands at the corners of the streets. He would toil and travel, day and night, without recompense or hope of reward, if thereby he could contribute to lift the humble and the lowly to manhood and its opportunities. With physical strength and mental vigor was spent for others his substance also, and when he died he left in all less than the value of one year's salary. Underneath all these gentle qualities there lived a personal courage which never quailed in the face of danger. When, under a dispensation now, thank God, forever passed away, his distinguished colleague, for words spoken in debate, fell upon the floor of the Senate Chamber beneath the bludgeon of one mad with the fury of the times, Mr. WILSON, though one of the youngest Senators in service, and yet hardly known to those among whom he stood, denounced in his place the assault as "brutal, murderous, and cowardly." And then, in answer to a challenge from the assailant himself, he had the greater courage to defy both him and the barbarous code behind which such men skulk in words which will live as long as the history of those dark times and darker deeds shall be read of men. From that hour till the day broke upon a regenerated Republic he carried his life in his hand; but never, to save that life, did he deviate a hair's breadth from the line of his duty.

The gratitude of the Commonwealth whose commission in the public service he bore so long and with such signal fidelity and ability, and her grief at his loss, would bid me speak many things I must leave unsaid. A personal admiration of his life and work, joined with an uninterrupted and confiding friendship of many years, has already extended the language of eulogy beyond the proper limits of this occasion. The rest must be left to the history of the times in which he lived, and of the Republic to whose true glory his life was consecrated.

Mr. President, it is appointed unto all men once to die, and an untimely death overtakes no one, however inscrutable to mortal vision is the dispensation. But we seem to see clearly, even now, that this great change came to Mr. WILSON in the fullness of time. In the fierce battle of life he had won the victory. The work to which he had set apart that life was done; for his countrymen were all free, were all equal before the law, and were at peace with the world and with one another. He died full of years, of honors, and in the blessed hope of a glorious immortality. His mission here had indeed ended.

We cannot turn, however, from the contemplation of a life so humble and lowly in its beginning, so full of patriotic endeavor and noble achievement through all its progress, and so illustrious in its end, without reverently exclaiming, Surely the ways of man are fashioned of God!

And now, Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the distinguished dead, so recently our Presiding Officer, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and fifty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

JUDGE WILSON M'CANDLESS.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 219) to permit the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania to retire.

The bill was read. It extends and makes applicable the provisions of section 714 of the Revised Statutes to Hon. Wilson McCandless, judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, in consequence of his physical disability, notwithstanding he has not attained the age of seventy years.

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. All bills which propose to increase expenditure should be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana make that point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I withhold the point of order, if I may do so, until an explanation is made by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say only a few words in explanation of this bill. As gentlemen are aware, under the provisions of the seven hundred and fourteenth section of the Revised Statutes any judge of the United States who has served ten years and attained the age of seventy years may retire from office, and receive for the remainder of his natural life the same salary as that to which he may be entitled at the date of his resignation. Judge McCandless, for whose benefit this bill has been introduced, has not yet attained the age of seventy years, being only, I believe, sixty-six years of age. He has nevertheless been in the public service for over twenty years, during all of which time he has distinguished himself for his fidelity, for his purity, and for the ability with which he has discharged the duties of his office. For over a year, however, he has been laboring under paralysis, which has affected his speech to that extent that it is almost impossible for him to discharge the duties of his office.

I have recently had the opportunity of speaking with the judge of the circuit court, with the marshal of that district, and with a large majority of the members of the bar. They unanimously urge the passage of this bill as an act of justice to a long-tried and faithful public servant, who has worn himself out in the service of the Government, and who must perforce retire, and that upon but limited means. I hope there will not be a dissenting voice from the passage of this bill.

Mr. CONGER. How long has he served as judge?

Mr. KNOTT. For over twenty years, as I am informed.

Mr. CONGER. In the same position?

Mr. KNOTT. In the same position, as judge of the district court for the western district of Pennsylvania. I am informed that the bill passed the House unanimously at the last session, but failed for want of time in the Senate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I dislike very much to say anything in opposition to a bill of this description. I would not do so if I did not conceive that it would be making a very bad precedent, one which might be very troublesome hereafter. We have a general law which provides that judges who have served ten years and have reached the age of seventy may retire upon a pension or salary for life. I voted against that bill when it was pending in Congress because I thought it very dangerous that we should begin the work of pensioning civil officers The British government has a very large amount of pensions on its civil list, and it has become enormously expensive to that government.

Until recently we have never pensioned any civil officer. That general law, however, did provide for cases of that sort. Since that time we have passed some special bills pensioning particular judges. I have deemed it my duty to vote against every one of them. I do not doubt the faithful services of the gentleman whom this bill proposes to retire upon a pension; but I simply desire to invite the attention of the House to it as a precedent which may become dangerous and as one which I think we ought not to establish. I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that the bill may be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. KNOTT. As I remarked before, the majority in Congress a few years ago deemed it wise to make a provision that the judges of the United States upon reaching the age of seventy years might retire upon their pay after having served ten years. If that was just, if that was wise, it is impossible for me to conceive of the injustice or the want of wisdom in passing this bill for the relief of a faithful servant who has served us over twenty years, and who lacks but three or four years at the outside of reaching the age prescribed by the statute.

What can be attained by rejecting the bill? We either force him to retire from his position now in poverty or to remain in the judge's place four years longer, to the great detriment of the public interest. As to the propriety of a civil pension-list, this side of the House is not responsible. We have it upon our statute-books already, and the present bill is simply to extend its benefit to one who, if any judge in the United States has ever merited that benefit, is certainly entitled to it. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope, before the gentleman calls the previous question, he will allow me a moment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to inquire the age of Judge McCandless and how long he has held this position.

Mr. KNOTT. I have already said that he has served for twenty years or more as district judge of the western district of Pennsylvania. He is now sixty-six, or in his sixty-sixth year, as I am informed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will now allow me a moment.

Mr. KNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that no act ever passed Congress so entirely opposed to the genius of our Government as this one authorizing a civil-pension list. In the early days of the Republic such legislation was really deemed impossible, as the history of the country shows. This act was passed a few years ago; it sprang up in that unsettled period of our legislation at the instance of the other side of the Chamber. Now, that measure, so full of serious objection, is proposed to be extended in its effects, when most gentlemen believe that the original law was wrong and all believe it to be excessively liberal in its provisions. This is, I think, the first instance—it may be possibly the second—where the law has been made more liberal than its original terms were. Against this I object. Having been opposed to the original measure, I trust that no private consideration, no personal motives, emanating from high character and excellence, shall be allowed to extend a bad law, an unwise measure, further than its original provisions went. I am aware, sir, that very few gentlemen have held positions on the Federal bench with more honor to themselves and credit to the country than the judge of the western district of Pennsylvania. This is conceded by all. But I do regret that an attempt is now made to extend the provisions of that law beyond its original terms. I regret it, and for one I shall feel compelled to vote against this bill.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield now for a moment to my colleague on the committee from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just one word in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] for the purpose of indicating that the republicans on the Judiciary Committee do not unite or accord with him in relation to this proposition, and also one word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is not a party question at all.

Mr. FRYE. Since I have been in the Congress of the United States, at each session of Congress a proposition has been made and urged vehemently that the salaries of judges of district courts should be raised; that they were not sufficiently paid for the service rendered. The question has been presented before the Judiciary Committee, and my impression is that an increase of salary has been reported on favorably by that committee. The opposition to the bill was this: To be sure the salaries are not high. But when these judges arrive at the age of seventy years they retire with a reasonable salary, a reasonable provision made for them. That answer has been considered sufficient by the House, and the proposition to increase the salaries of these judges has been defeated. Now here, sir, is a judge of fine abilities, as I understand, who has served for twenty-three years, and now, in his old age, without any property whatever, he is incapable of further service by a visitation of God of paralysis. He is now compelled to retire. If he retires to-day, he has been receiving a salary just sufficient to support him and his family, and he gets no advantage from the pension provided for judges who retire at seventy years of age. He goes out of office without anything to support himself and his family. I submit to the House that there is no danger in a precedent like this. This man is entitled to his pension as though he had served up to the day he were seventy; and I hope the House will vote in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, and relieve this man and give him his salary.

Mr. KNOTT. I yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire, sir, to say but a few words in favor of the passage of this bill. I have known the distinguished gentlemen mentioned in the bill from my boyhood. For twenty-odd years I have practiced before him. And I am glad to know that his reputation for integrity and ability has extended throughout our broad Union. But I desire to add one further remark to all that has been said. The immense amount of labor that has been imposed upon Judge McCandless, no gentleman, perhaps, outside of his district can realize. The enormous number of bankrupt cases and internal-revenue cases coming before him have surpassed almost any district in the United States. Judge McCandless has literally worn himself out in the service of his country, and is without any fortune. He has given the best years of his life to the service of the United States, and I think it would be an ungracious thing to turn him out in his advanced years with his physical infirmities, without the provision made for those who, at a certain age, whether disabled or not, have ample provision made for them by the United States. As was said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] this bill passed the House during the last Congress without opposition, and it would have passed the Senate, but Judge McCandless, hoping that his physical disabilities would be removed, and that he would still be able to serve the Government, wrote to the Senators from our State begging them to prevent the passage of the bill. He now feels, sir, that he is unable to discharge his duties, and hence he hopes that this bill will pass, and I trust that it will pass by a unanimous vote.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KNOTT. I will do so.

Mr. CONGER. There is this consideration in regard to the business of this district which perhaps may have some weight with the House: Under the law as it now exists this judge is not compelled either to resign or to retire, and there is no one to perform the duties of that office in that district unless other district judges volunteer to perform them or the circuit judge is able to do so. I think that this consideration in this case should have some weight with this House. This bill should pass in order that this judge may be enabled to retire and some other judge be appointed who can perform the duties of the district.

Mr. KNOTT. I now call the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 113, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was then taken upon ordering the main question; and upon a division there were—ayes 97, noes 42; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KNOTT and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 112, noes 48.

So the main question was ordered, which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question. I want to record my vote against a civil-pension list.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that the yeas and nays be taken upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I do not object to that.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I now call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 145, nays 101, not voting 44, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Banks, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Boone, Bradley, John Young Brown, William R. During the call of the roll,

Mr. HENDEE said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. DENISON, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. L. P. LUCKEY, his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 282) to declare the road leading from Concordia, Kentucky, to Mooleyville, Kentucky, a post-road; and

An act (H. R. No. 283) to change the name of the steamboat Tom Jasper, of Saint Louis.

3.65 DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BONDS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a report which under the call of committees this morning would not have been strictly in order. It is a matter of great importance, and I desire to submit it now to the House. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back, with a negative recommendation, House bill No. 815, for the payment of the interest of the 3.65 bonds issued under the act of Congress, approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." In connection with this negative report I desire to state that it comes from the committee without any dissent.

The committee are of opinion that the Government of the United States——

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow the question to be stated from the Chair, so that we may know what action is asked of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, reports back, by order of that committee, with an adverse recommendation, the bill of the House on the subject of the payment of the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I hope it will be reported before the gentleman proceeds.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. It is too late to make that point.

Mr. CONGER. This is the first time there has been an opportunity to raise the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point. This is an important matter to a great number of persons, and its consideration will take but a moment. The committee make a negative recommendation; but they desire that I should make a statement so that by our action the value of these bonds may not be in any manner impaired, but that on the contrary, by what passes here in reference to this subject, the credit of the District may be strengthened.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consent to let this matter go over till Monday. I understand that there will be considerable debate on it.

Mr. RANDALL. If gentlemen had allowed me to go on with my statement I should have been through by this time.

Mr. HOAR. There are other gentlemen, I understand, who wish to speak on the question.

Mr. CONGER. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the report.

HARBOR OF VERMILLION, OHIO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of the 12th instant, the report of Lieutenant-Colonel C. E. Blunt, United States Engineers, on the harbor of Vermillion, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WASHINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the secretary of the Washington National Monument Society, transmitting a petition, signed by 15,000 citizens of the United States, for the completion of the monument; which was referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the proposed National Census of 1875.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILWAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the president of the Washington and Georgetown Railway, transmitting, in compliance with section 16 of the act of incorporation, a report of the operations of the company for the year ending December 31, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

UNITED STATES AND CUBA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 17th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, inclosing correspondence between the Government of the United States and Spain in relation to the island of Cuba; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CAROLINE M. PURVIANCE AND FRANCIS WYETH.

On motion of Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 191) for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

DEATH OF HENRY WILSON.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, communicated to the House the resolutions of the Senate on the announcement of the death of HENRY WILSON, late Vice-President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct that the message received from the Senate in regard to the death of the late Vice-President be now read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of the resolutions from the Senate, now about to be brought to the attention of the House, the privileges of the floor be extended to the delegation of editors from Indiana who are now visiting this Capitol. I believe this is in conformity with precedent.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 21, 1876.

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of HENRY WILSON, late Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, who had been for eighteen years of consecutive service a member of this body.

Resolved, That business be now suspended that the friends and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of HENRY WILSON, late Vice-President of the United States.

Resolved, That business be now suspended to allow fitting tributes to be paid to his public and private virtues; and that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House at the close of such remarks shall adjourn.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, again, and seemingly all too soon, Massachusetts calls upon the Houses of Congress to pause in their customary labors and join her in paying tribute to the memory of one of her departed statesmen. This time she has to mourn the loss of him who had been honored by the highest office in the Federal Government attained by any of her citizens during the last half century, HENRY WILSON, the eighteenth Vice-President of the United States.

Born at Farmington, in the State of New Hampshire, on the 16th day of February, 1812, his early life was passed in unceasing toil. Yet from childhood he had such a thirst for knowledge that when at his maturity he left his birth-place, he had not only read but had stored in his memory, where it remained ever after available for instant use, whatever the best authorities upon English and American history up to that time had written.

In 1833 Mr. WILSON removed to Natick, in Massachusetts, and made that place his home. There he was married, and there his remains now repose with those of his wife and son. His business life, perhaps the least important part of his history, was confined entirely to the manufacture of boots and shoes, a branch of industry then in its infancy in the part of Massachusetts in which he resided. But in business he always exhibited the same patience of labor and faithfulness in performance which characterized all his undertakings. He was by no means the least efficient among those whose ingenuity and exertions brought that manufacture up to its present vast proportions.

It is, however, in his public life that we are more peculiarly interested. He took an active part in the canvass of 1840, which resulted in the election of General Harrison to the Presidency, and was himself elected in that year to the Massachusetts house of representatives. From that time forward his name has never been disconnected from the history of Massachusetts politics, except so far as it is more intimately associated with the politics of the whole country. Once defeated, he was in 1844 a member of the State senate, and was re-elected in 1845. In this latter year he presided over a convention assembled to oppose the admission of Texas into the Union. In 1846 he returned to the house of representatives, having declined a renomination to the senate. In 1848 he was a member of the national convention which nominated General Taylor. This nomination was effected against the strenuous opposition of Mr. WILSON, who felt that Mr. Webster should have received the honor. He consequently was zealous in opposing the election of General Taylor, and took part in the calling and organizing of the Buffalo convention which nominated Martin Van Buren for President and Charles Francis Adams for Vice-President. He was chairman of the free-soil State committee in 1849. In 1850 he again sat in the State house of representatives, and was the candidate of his party for speaker. In the fall of that year he was one of the originators and chief supporters of the coalition between the free-soil and democratic parties, which elected Mr. Boutwell governor, Mr. WILSON himself to the State senate and made him president of that body, and, after a severe contest, sent Charles Sumner to the Senate of the United States. In 1852 he was a delegate to the national convention of the free-soil party held at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; was chairman of the national free-soil committee; failed of an election to Congress by less than a hundred votes, and was again president of the Massachusetts senate. His address of welcome to Louis Kossuth, made the same year as chairman of a legislative committee, won the applause of all parties. In 1853 he was a member of and took a prominent part in a convention called to revise the constitution of the Commonwealth. Here he made his influence felt, although the convention contained the ablest men in the State of every party. In the same year he was the candidate of his party for governor, and again in 1854, but was never elected to that office. In the latter year he was actively engaged in organizing the opposition to the repeal of the Missouri compromise. In that year, also, he joined the native American or know-nothing party, as it was called, which elected its candidate for governor and a large majority in both branches of the Legislature. That Legislature met in January, 1855, and, on the resignation of Mr. Everett, elected Mr. WILSON to the United States Senate. He took his seat in that body on the 10th day of February, 1855, and continued to occupy it until he assumed the office of Vice-President, March 4, 1873.

Time would fail me were I to attempt to recount his labors as a member of the Senate. Suffice it to say that when the history of its memorable doings, for the last twenty memorable years, shall come to be written, there will be no chapter of the whole record that will not perforce mention the name and speak of the labors of HENRY WILSON, of Massachusetts. And the history of the party to which he belonged, and at whose birth he assisted, will make mention of no man who did more to lead that party from its early adversity and defeat to its final triumph and long tenure of power; no man who labored harder, through good and through evil report, with brain, and tongue, and hand in the cause to which he was devoted; no man who was keener in foreseeing and surer in taking the precise step in which the people were ready to follow; no man who understood better how to lead forward his party from position to position until, through their support, every measure of policy which he deemed essential was finally established, than HENRY WILSON, of Massachusetts. And so it happened that before, and during, and since our civil conflict he was all the time one of the foremost leaders, one of the most trusted advisers among the men who in those periods in the main shaped the destiny of our people.

With this brief sketch of the wonderfully successful career of Mr. WILSON I might pause. But were I to do so I might leave the impression that his life was hardly an exceptional one in this new and growing country. There are, it is true, innumerable instances in each succeeding generation of men who, from poverty and deprivation, have worked their way upward to high position, and meanwhile have educated themselves sufficiently to be enabled to bear off their honors bravely and do credit to themselves and the State. But Mr. WILSON had to contend against no ordinary odds. His was not the lot of him who in a new country, by simple force of character, energy, and industry, becomes a leader among the hardy pioneers who surround him. He went a self-taught youth from his rustic home into the most populous portion of one of the oldest States in the Union. He took up his abode in the immediate vicinity of our most ancient seat of learning. He chose as his political associates a party comprising probably two-thirds of the people of Massachusetts and an equal proportion of those who might truly be called the educated and cultivated men in a community behind none on this continent in intelligence and refinement. It was with the picked men in such a community and in such a party that he was brought into comparison and finally into competition. And it seems to me the great success of his life that he took a front rank among such competitors and finally superseded the foremost of them in the leadership of his party.

He must then have been possessed of some unusual qualities besides mere intellectual power, general knowledge, the gift of eloquence, or personal character. These were possessed in sufficient degree by hundreds of his compeers. True, he was not lacking in energy; he shrunk from no labor; his mind worked easily and he rarely failed to detect the vulnerable point in his adversary's position; he had no dearth of general information, and even in his early days his style of oratory was far above the average. But over and above all this he had in a pre-eminent degree two especial qualifications for political leadership. These were, first an intimate acquaintance with all the facts of our past and current political history. A memory naturally tenacious had been trained and crammed to hold this knowledge of political facts always at command. This kind of knowledge has not of late been common in Massachusetts. One effect of the course of education in that State during the last third of a century, combined doubtless with other causes, has been to produce a distaste for political life among men of the highest education, and an aversion to any great familiarity with the details of American political history.

In the second place, Mr. WILSON had no superior as a party organizer. There may be some who will deem the possession of the faculty for organizing men into a compact and formidable body as not a subject for eulogy. Such is not my opinion. English and American history for centuries has been the history of parties. No other instrumentality has been, none is likely to be devised which will supplant them as the ready and necessary means for molding the policy of the state. In a country where new questions are constantly arising and former ones becoming obsolete the organizer is scarcely, if at all, less important than the thinker. The student will spend his life in the seclusion of his closet; the orator, be he ever so impassioned and eloquent, will arouse only discord and ill-temper, until he appears who can transform their speculations and declamation into a body of measures to the support of which he can bring a potent array of his fellow-men. It was only through the organizing skill of HENRY WILSON that it became possible for Charles Sumner to pass from a private station to the Senate of the United States. If those who claim to be leaders of thought and to possess superiority in culture and knowledge in our community desire or expect hereafter to resume that guidance and control over our affairs which they have of late been wont to complain are not conceded to them, they must, first, in knowledge of and familiarity with national and local politics, and secondly, in learning how to organize and direct masses of men, take a lesson from the life of HENRY WILSON, of Massachusetts.

With all these qualifications, however, continued success would rarely fall to the lot of any man who had not some great purpose to accomplish. Knowledge of affairs and skill in party organization would be acquirements dangerous to the public weal unless accompanied by a high sense of honor and unselfish devotion to a noble cause. In the case of Mr. WILSON no one needs to be told that the sentiment that controlled him was the anti-slavery sentiment, which he shared in common with almost all the people of his State and section. But while with most it was for a long time only a sentiment, with him it became the pivot on which his political conduct turned. And without even an allusion to the measures and events which have for many years been uppermost in the minds of us all, without speculating upon what might have been done or what avoided, it is not too much to say that at this time and in this place, where the people of every State in the Union are once again fully represented, there is no man who will hesitate to do full justice to the purity of motive, the sincerity of conviction, and the elevation of sentiment of the earlier New England anti-slavery men.

But it is the crowning glory of Vice-President WILSON'S life that while he never wavered in his hostility to an institution which in his view was a violation of human rights and a standing insult to the dignity of labor, he never permitted himself to cherish any bitterness of feeling toward his political antagonists, even after the angry conflict of arms had for a time almost obliterated all kindly feelings between the divided sections. Many and many are the men in all parts of the South who in their hour of distress have found in him a friend and benefactor, and here almost within reach of my hand are those who bear cheerful testimony to his efforts in their behalf whereby their prison doors were opened and they themselves returned to their homes and friends.

And so in a more public manner in the last year of his life, when he felt that his efforts in behalf of human freedom and the elevation of labor (for he always united the two in his thoughts) had reached their full fruition, he set himself at work to ascertain what might be done to alleviate the distresses of the southern people. Forgetting the politician and the partizan, he remembered only that he was a man and a Christian. And thus it happened that when he came to die he left behind no personal or political enemy, but was at peace with all mankind. A re-united nation in mourning sympathy followed his mortal part to its final resting-place, and to-day expresses a common grief in a common loss. He died on the 23d of November, within the walls of the Capitol—a most fitting place. Bereft of wife and child, he could claim kindred but with the Republic, and, as it were, in her embrace he sank to sleep. Upon him, self-taught, self-trained, but who had attained nearly all the honors his native land could bestow, speaking, however unworthily, for the district in which he lived, and for the university which is its pride and boast, I can freely bestow that meed of praise which the greatest of Roman orators was constrained to render to the foremost of Roman soldiers, "Fuit in illo ingenium, ratio, memoria, literatura, cogitatio, diligentia."

And speaking for no single district, nor yet for any single country, but in the name of our common humanity, I can with the common consent, place a still higher tribute, which Roman orator and Roman soldier knew not of, the crown of that Christian charity which "sufferеth long and is kind, envieth not, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly," which "thinketh no evil, rejoiceth not in iniquity but rejoiceth in the truth," charity which "never faileth," upon the tomb of HENRY WILSON, of Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I rise to second the resolutions in honor of HENRY WILSON, late Vice-President of the United States, which have just been presented to this House by my friend and colleague from Massachusetts, and in a few words to urge their adoption.

Standing here, Mr. Speaker, in the presence of so many distinguished gentlemen who had the privilege of familiar social, private, and public intercourse with Mr. WILSON, who learned his ambition, his aspiration, and his hopes, who saw him in his daily walks and heard his conversation, I know how feeble will be the tribute which I must pay to him. Nevertheless I bring my humble offering to his grave.

He was, as has been already said, a man of the people. He rose from the humble walks of life by great energy, by great intelligence, to the highest position in the country save one. He died in the possession and enjoyment of the second honor of the Republic.

Mr. WILSON understood the people. The people understood him. He seemed to understand the voice of the people and their judgment before it was uttered. He stood for many years as if with his hand upon the popular pulse. He felt every heart-beat of the people and announced their coming judgment.

Mr. WILSON was a man of whom I think it may be said that he was unsurpassed in private virtue. As a citizen for the purity of his private life, as a politician for the purity of his purposes, he had no superior. However men may differ from him in the views which he entertained; however bitter at times may have been the contests in which he engaged, I think to-day there are no persons within the sound of my voice who will say they do not believe that he was sincere and honest in every public and private act.

No man can speak of HENRY WILSON without making reference to the relations which he occupied to party and to the Republic. To speak of him otherwise than as an advocate of liberty and as an adversary and opponent of human slavery would be to do injustice to his memory. He commenced early in his political career as an advocate of the slave. At first he only sought to prevent the extension of human slavery. At last when war burst upon the country he became the determined advocate of the abolition of that institution. I would not refer to any act of his which might call back one bitter thought to any gentleman upon this floor, but he believed that the Constitution of his country was a free Constitution, and, with Washington and Jefferson, that the institution of slavery was contrary to the genius of the Republic. And for many years he battled faithfully, as he believed, in the cause of the human race.

He saw, Mr. Speaker, nothing in the Constitution which needed amendment, and could his voice have been heard—could those gentlemen in the South who to-day are willing to pay tribute to the memory of HENRY WILSON; could they have heard his voice when he urged gradual emancipation; could they have believed him then; could they have found in him then, as they do now, the faithful and honest man—the change which had been decreed by the Almighty power would have come without shock or disaster, but with benefaction alike to master and slave.

Mr. WILSON, as a politician, pressed his views upon the public with persistency and zeal, but I do not think he could properly be called a belligerent man. He did not so much undertake to convince and convert his enemies as to concentrate and combine his friends and sympathizers into one grand power, with which to execute his purposes. He, therefore, had few personal controversies in his life, few personal encounters. I think I may say he had as few personal enemies as any public man of his time. Indeed I doubt whether he can be said to have had any personal enemies.

When war burst upon the country, Mr. WILSON left nothing undone or unattempted which he believed would lead up to the triumph of the Government and the armies of the country. He was not a trifler in war or peace, and when war did come, it was with him war to the knife. But when the war was over, he was kind, forgiving, and affectionate. To the poor victims of war his heart overflowed with pity; with the tenderness of a woman he wept as he staunched the wounds and assuaged the woes of war.

After the close of that sad period he proved to the people of the North and South that he had no hostility to the men whom he believed the institution of slavery had cursed. For them he had nothing but kindness and affection. He welcomed them back, asking only, when they returned to live with him under a redeemed and purified Constitution, that they would come with a sincere determination honestly and zealously to work with him for the glory of the country.

Mr. WILSON died in the Capitol of his country; a most fitting place. He died after probably having accomplished all that was left to him to accomplish. He died; and I think he receives to-day the fittest eulogy from the people of the country, the people of his own class, the humble—for Mr. WILSON never forgot that he was from the poor, that his origin was among the poor and the humble—and the proudest eulogy which goes up is that incense which rises from the hearts of the humble and the poor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, lest I shall trespass too long upon the House, I hasten to conclude. I have spoken of HENRY WILSON only as a national man. Massachusetts to-day mourns HENRY WILSON, and Massachusetts, Mr. Speaker, has cause for sorrow. John A. Andrew, Charles Sumner, and now HENRY WILSON; HENRY WILSON, the last of the grand trio. HENRY WILSON had the confidence of the people of Massachusetts. He had their love, and they bore him upon their arms into the office of the Vice-President of the United States. He was their representative, and spoke their voice; and as they gather his remains to their final resting-place they treasure his memory, and they will transmit his fair example to their sons, and point to it as worthy of imitation and emulation for the humble and the poor, and for their inspiration.

Mr. Speaker, John A. Andrew, at the opening of the war, during the struggle, and at its close, was the governor of that State. Charles Sumner and HENRY WILSON spoke her voice in the Senate of the United States. And I think, sir, it is no arrogance to say that the utterance of those three of her noble sons, now all departed, the utterance of those three was the true utterance of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, of the nation, and of the age in which they lived. Charles Sumner passed away at the most fitting and proper period, perhaps, for his death. He had arrived at the highest honors. He had accomplished all there was for him to do and he passed away; but, Mr. Speaker, not until he lifted his voice to welcome back to the protection of the Constitution and into the fold of the Republic every man who had left it during the war of the rebellion. John A. Andrew before his death announced with his ringing voice his desire that every person in the Republic should come back again and enjoy the privileges and the franchises of the Republic; and HENRY WILSON before his death had shown to all the people that his voice was for reconciliation, for peace, for amnesty.

Mr. Speaker, now as Massachusetts gathers to her bosom the remains of her chosen son, what is the message, what is the voice that she utters in the ears of the nation? It is not the voice of hate, it is not the voice of hostility, it is not that: it is the voice of love, fraternal feeling, and concord. May she not say "These were the men who spoke my voice; you have heard it, and after all was it not a voice in favor of 'peace on earth and good-will to men?'"

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, with whatever warmth of maternal affection Abigail Colbath welcomed the boy who was born to her in Farmington, New Hampshire, on the 16th of February, 1812, there was naturally a feeling throughout the family that he was not a welcome guest. The event doubtless evoked the sympathy of friends and neighbors, for they knew that the chilling shadow of poverty darkened the household; that want was to sit by the cradle of the little one, and that it was probable he would at times ask for bread when the mother would have none to give. Could, however, Abigail and Winthrop Colbath have penetrated the secrets of the future, they would have been exalted with joy and a novel consciousness of pride. They would have seen that, though poverty was to attend his infancy and poorly-requited labor be his lot in youth and early manhood, their child was destined to be a positive and beneficient force during one of the great epochs in his country's history, and that, after a life closed in the "sere and yellow leaf," his remains would be borne from the Capitol of his country by a grateful and sorrowing people to the State he had so long served and which in recognition of his services had honored him as it had few of its citizens.

I have heard men say that HENRY WILSON was not a great man. This may be true; but, if it be, it proves that a good spirit is a more potent social agent than great parts. HENRY WILSON, by his fidelity to conviction, by his freedom from selfish ambitions, by his powers as an organizer, his capacity to combine for common objects those who, differing widely on incidental points, agreed only on the leading purpose of the day, and by his almost ceaseless and seemingly unwearying labor, exercised during the last quarter of a century an influence as powerful and wide-spread as any among the most gifted of his fellow-citizens.

I remember his advent to the politics of Massachusetts as the Natick cobbler, in 1840, shortly before which date I had ceased to be a working jeweler in Boston, whither I had gone in the winter of 1834-'35, in pursuit of employment, which the severity of a financial crisis denied me in my native city. The earnestness of the man, the simplicity and directness of his character, his knowledge of facts, his clearness of statement, and the language in which he clothed thought and fact gave promise of a potential future, and his position in the politics of Massachusetts was at once assured. Mr. WILSON and I were then members of opposing parties; he was a whig, I a democrat. Having returned to my home and engaged in other pursuits than those for which the labors of my youth had fitted me, I had not observed his progress in connection with public affairs, and he next came specially under my notice in 1852, when he had been a delegate to the national convention of the free-soil party, held at Pittsburgh in 1852, and been called to preside over that body, and also made chairman of the national committee of that party. From Pittsburgh he came to Philadelphia. I met him soon after his arrival, and the interest we each felt in preventing the extension to the Territories of a system of unpaid labor and to the creation of more slave States had removed the political differences that had divided us twelve years before. From that time we were to be co-workers and friends, and our meetings were frequent, for thenceforward it seemed impossible to conduct a campaign in Pennsylvania without the aid of HENRY WILSON'S prudent counsels and popular appeals. As a public speaker he was welcomed to every part of our State, and I do not exaggerate when I say that he addressed more people in Pennsylvania than any other man who never resided within her limits. In parts of the State he was loved as he was by the reformatory and progressive people of Massachusetts. His name never failed to attract a large audience or his addresses to inspire with courage and the purpose of determined and effective labor those who heard him.

We shall hear his voice no more on our mountain sides and in our beautiful valleys, but he has not ceased to be an influence for good among us. The good men do lives after them. The story of HENRY WILSON'S youth, if fitly written, will be clothed in pure monosyllabic Saxon, that untaught children may understand its full import. Nor do the incidents of his maturer life need rhetorical setting. They speak for themselves with such force and directness that his biographer who shall attempt by literary effort to add to their force will mar the influence of his example. To produce its just effect the statement of the means by which he rose, step by step, from the shoemaker's seat to the Legislature of Massachusetts, to the position of next to the senior member of the Senate of the United States, and subsequently to the Vice-Presidency, should be made in his own simple and direct style. His example of frugality and abstinence from the use of all hurtful stimulants, his habit of personal economy, his indifference to worldly wealth, his sympathetic generosity to the poor and afflicted, his unceasing labors, and the honors that attended them are inspiring examples to every gifted child of poverty. Invaluable as the story of HENRY WILSON'S life is to us of the North, now that the terrible apprehension of servile revolt and of arbitrarily enforced social equality between the races, which filled many minds after war had emancipated the slaves, that hung like threatening clouds over southern society, has vanished, it is far more valuable to the South, among whose people are so many who will be benefited by learning how a poor and almost friendless boy can find pleasure in books and by their friendly assistance mount from helpless obscurity to personal power and possible distinction. But not to the humble alone does the life of HENRY WILSON speak, for, properly considered, its great lesson is to those whose lot in life is happier, whose privilege it is to legislate for and govern others. In his career they will find proof that energies, which neglected or trained in vicious ways would be dangerous to society, if turned toward self-culture and directed to noble purposes, will add not only to the power but to the glory of the State.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, it is no part of my purpose to pronounce a studied panegyric upon either the genius or the public services of the distinguished man to the memory of whose virtues we would pay a becoming tribute of respect, and the recollection of whose frailties, if any he had, we would bury with his moldering dust forever beyond our view. I seek, sir, to add but a single leaf to the garland we would hang upon his tomb. I rise simply to express the unfeigned and heart-felt admiration of my people as well as my own high appreciation of that genuine manliness and true nobility of soul exhibited by the illustrious deceased in one of the most unostentatious yet to my mind one of the most singularly beautiful and touching acts of his whole life.

But a short time previous to his death Mr. WILSON had occasion to visit the metropolis of my native State, where he was welcomed with that cordial, open-handed, warm-hearted hospitality which I am proud to say has always characterized its generous people. All classes, irrespective of political prejudices and party affiliations, vied with each other in extending to him the evidences of that high consideration due to one of the most distinguished citizens of the country, and especially to the high position he occupied as Vice-President of the United States. No attention which could possibly render his stay agreeable was omitted by those into whose midst he had come. And no one was better able to appreciate their courtesy than their illustrious visitor. But while he was in the full enjoyment of those amenities which were so genial to his own warm and generous nature, cheered on every hand by friendly greetings, welcomed, honored, and entertained in circles of the highest refinement and culture, where all was joy and happiness and peace, a far different scene was presented in an unpretending Kentucky home a little over a hundred miles away. There, around the hearth-stone of one whom he had known in former years as an able and determined political opponent, one from whom he had been long separated by the fierce conflict of party strife and the still fiercer clash of war, were gathered the wan specter of anxiety and anguish and sorrow; for there the proud form which had challenged the admiration of thousands in the forum, upon the rostrum, in the Senate, and amid the crash of battle, stricken and prostrate by disease, was wasting rapidly away. There one of the grandest spirits that ever illustrated the dignity and majesty of our race was pluming its pinions for its final flight to brighter climes. Breckinridge the proscribed—the exile in his own native land—the alien in the midst of his own people, who loved him as a brother, lay dying. When the sad intelligence was communicated to the great man whose memory we mourn to-day, he threw aside all the fascinations of the most refined and elegant hospitality, and with his great heart full of friendship and fraternal feeling hastened to the bedside of the dying statesman, who in the calm dignity of his own majestic soul had borne for years the ban of proscription, there to tender his sympathy and testify his warm personal regard for one whom he had formerly recognized as the exponent and champion of principles which he himself had made it the great mission of his life to oppose in every legitimate manner and with all the earnestness and fervor of his own zealous and determined nature. Ah, Mr. Speaker, what a scene was that! The Vice-President of a proud and powerful people, with every feature of his benevolent face beaming with the kindest sentiments of friendship and brotherly love, as he held the emaciated hand of the dying hero in his own warm and cordial grasp! What an example to the emulation of the genuine American everywhere; what a total absence of every trace of that bitter, unforgiving, relentless, remorseless hate that clings alone to the ignoble soul. What a sublime spectacle of that exalted magnanimity which always belongs to a noble nature.

Mr. Speaker, that simple act of manly courtesy secured for our dead Vice-President a warm place in the heart of every true Kentuckian. From that hour there was a total oblivion of everything like prejudice that they may have entertained against him. From that hour there was not a household in my native State in which HENRY WILSON would not have been hailed as a welcome and an honored guest. For, sir, that simple, touching, unostentatious incident proved him to be a generous, warm-hearted, high-souled, noble man, and an honor to the proud old Commonwealth that gave him birth. And, sir, when the lightning-winged messenger whispered over this land the melancholy tidings of his peculiarly mournful death it nowhere touched a more responsive chord, nor will his memory be anywhere more tenderly enshrined than in the grateful hearts of Kentucky.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, during my brief service in this body the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been chief mourner among the States. Her great Senator Charles Sumner was first summoned to his account, and then in quick succession Alvah Crocker, Samuel Hooper, and James Buffinton, members of this House during the last Congress, each honored and distinguished and all beloved by those who knew them, entered the dread portal! Now again she is sorely stricken! One who had long and faithfully served her in her own councils and in those of the nation, one whom she had given to the Republic to occupy the position next highest in dignity and power, has passed away, and her sister Commonwealths may not fail to assure her of their common sympathy in this hour of her new and sad bereavement.

It is my regret that the voice of Pennsylvania is not heard through one who knew him more intimately than myself, and if I fail to justly record his personal virtues or to place a proper estimate on his public services, I pray it may be attributed to the absence of those intimate personal relations which alone enable us to thoroughly appreciate and understand the motives and actions of men.

Born in obscurity and reared in poverty, he early exhibited that indomitable and unceasing energy which so strongly marked his subsequent career. Amid the drudgery of his life, when bound apprentice to a farmer and when learning the trade of a shoemaker, he was assiduous in his efforts to acquire knowledge, and of him it may be truly said that he was "a self-made man," for all his early scholastic training was acquired by his own unaided exertions, under the most difficult and often the most disheartening circumstances.

His thirst for knowledge was intense, and his mind was too vigorous and acute to be blind to the fact that mere untutored and uncultured genius is of little avail when brought into contact with trained and disciplined intellect. The friendless condition of his boyhood, the grave and pressing necessities of his early manhood, his constant struggle with poverty, his unyielding determination to rise above the condition in which he was born, all tended to develop in him a sturdy independence of thought and action which was clearly exhibited at the very threshold of his public life. Sprung from the soil, knowing well its hard condition, allied by his antecedents with the sons of toil, never failing to recognize their rights, and ever ready to defend their wrongs, he did not hesitate in their interests to break political alliances, then all-alluring and most powerful, to assert the individuality of his convictions and the sincerity of his motives. Added to this independence of thought and action, he had that which is so necessary to great achievements, implicit faith in himself and in the soundness of his own judgment, giving directness, force, and simplicity to his character.

In him there was, too, a large-hearted charity, a deep human sympathy born of his early adversity, which impelled him during his whole life to befriend the poor and lowly, to lift up and succor the weak, to cheer and encourage the struggling, and to defend and protect the friendless and oppressed. And, sir, as I look back upon the clouds and darkness from which we have emerged and consider what sacrifices he made, what obloquy he endured, what labor he performed in order that this charity, this human sympathy, might find expression, I may not fail to avow my profound admiration for his sincerity, retaining, nevertheless, my own convictions as to the justice and propriety of the means by which he sought to accomplish results.

It was this same catholic spirit which caused him, when the civil war was ended, to devote all his energies to healing its wounds, to drying up its tears, and to rebuilding its places made waste and desolate. In him there was no bitterness; his heart concealed no vengeance; "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord," was his childlike, Christian faith, and in the last public act of his long career he placed it on record for all coming time; since, it was at his suggestion and by his desire and advice that the State convention of his party in Massachusetts, held at Worcester on the 29th day of September, 1875, over which he presided, adopted the following resolution:

That the republicans of Massachusetts welcome all auguries and evidences that the centennial of American Independence will be celebrated by the complete restoration of fraternity, and they express the opinion that the time has come for the removal of all remaining political disabilities.

Had he lived to-day we may believe that the spirit of this resolution would have received unanimous indorsement here as it did during the last Congress. That it has not is not the fault of him, being dead, nor of the people of the great Commonwealth who so loved and honored him.

To others I cheerfully leave the task of recounting with particularity his labors in the Senate during his long and eventful service. It is enough for me to say that, being of robust mental and physical nature, he was capable of great labor; that he was a worker in its true and best sense, and that during the war his name is connected either as author or advocate with nearly or quite all the military legislation of the period. His presence and official service were given to every public duty unselfishly and freely.

As a humanitarian he was abreast of, if not in advance of, public sentiment on every moral question, and he never shrank from the public advocacy of his views, whatever might be the effect on his political fortunes.

In contemplating his public life, the impulse is irresistible to contrast it with that of Charles Sumner, his colleague during the eighteen years of his senatorial career. To him he was most unlike, and yet he was no less useful. The one the patrician, educated in the groves of the academy; the other the plebeian, who, groping amid toil and penury, sought knowledge and found it by his own unaided efforts. Sumner was a man of books; WILSON, of men; Sumner, of ideas; WILSON, of deeds; Sumner, of theories; WILSON, of action; Sumner lived and moved in the unreal world of thought; WILSON moved and acted among men. Each had strong convictions. Sumner sought and would have his in paths chosen by himself; WILSON would accept results offered him by fortune or won in modes he did not prefer. As statesmen, Sumner acted in profound indifference, if not contempt, of the actual forces which existed, looking confidently to the end some time to come; WILSON labored in the light of and molded the influences which surrounded him, subordinating all minor matters to the object he desired to accomplish. As a result, Sumner theorized much, and left as memorials many splendid phrases; WILSON spoke much and identified himself with all the distinguished measures of his speech. Widely different in origin, tastes, thought, and action, these two men supplemented and complemented each other, in a way so rare and yet so admirable that the great Commonwealth which ever honored herself by honoring them may fail to find in long years to come two men who shall so truly reflect all of her that is good and true, manly and generous, learned and refined. No shadow fell upon their friendship in life, and they will go into history so linked together by the unity of their service and so bound together by the very dissimilarity of their training and action that the one may never be mentioned without recalling the honored name of the other.
